V. 39—45. Soon after this vision, Mary being in haste to communicate with Elisabeth, took a long journey from Nazareth to the hill-country of Judea, perhaps to Hebron, for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. f.) Being arrived she saluted Elisabeth, and probably congratulated her on the unexpected favour conferred on her: but no sooner did Elisabeth hear her voice, than she felt the infant leap in her womb in a very extraordinary manner; even as if he had been conscious of the presence of the mother of the great Redeemer, whom he was appointed to precede. At the same time, "Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit," and under his prophetical influence, she pronounced Mary and "the Fruit of her womb," to be most blessed, as peculiarly honoured by the most high God. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) Though Elisabeth was superior in age, in station, and in reputation, yet she considered Mary as so distinguished a person, by being chosen to be the mother of the Messiah, that she was filled with admiration, at being favoured with a visit from her, in addition to all her other mercies. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, Matt. 8:8,9.) She acknowledged the child which was to be born of her, to be "her Lord" and the Lord of all: (Marg. Ref. m. Note, Matt. 22:41—46.) and she declared that the infant in her womb, exulted for joy under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and as a kind of homage to his Lord. (Note, Gen. 25:22,23.) Indeed Mary was peculiarly happy, in that she had so readily and implicitly believed the divine message; by which means she had honoured God, and had received her mercies unmingled with rebukes; for the promise would surely and exactly be accomplished.—There was in this a reference to Zacharias's unbelief, and the painful rebuke under which he lay; but the subject was touched very gently, as it was proper from the mouth of Elisabeth.—It is remarkable, that Mary, though young and inexperienced, so readily believed a far more difficult promise, than that about which Zacharias, an aged priest and an experienced believer, had hesitated. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o. Note, 18—20.)—It does not appear, that Elisabeth knew the circumstances of Mary's vision, or her faith in the divine message, except by the Spirit of prophecy; for it may be concluded from the narrative, that she thus addressed Mary, before she had time to inform her of these matters. The words of Elisabeth, and all the circumstances of her interview with Mary, must have had a powerful effect in establishing the faith, and enlarging the expectations of the latter: and the favour and testimony of persons, so highly respected as Zacharias and Elisabeth, would powerfully

46 ¶ And Mary said, [p]My soul doth magnify the Lord,

47 And my spirit hath rejoiced in [q]God my Saviour.

48 For he hath [r]regarded the low estate of his handmaiden: for, behold, from henceforth [s]all generations shall call me blessed.

49 For [t]he that is mighty [u]hath done to me great things; [x]and holy is his name.

50 And [y]his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation.

51 He hath [z]showed strength with his arm: [a]he hath scattered the proud in [b]the imagination of their hearts.

52 He hath [c]put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.

53 He hath [d]filled the hungry with good things; [e]and the rich he hath sent empty away.

54 He [f]hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy; 55 As [g]he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever.

56 And Mary abode with her about three months, and returned to her own house.

58 And [i]her neighbours and her cousins heard how the Lord had showed great mercy upon her: [k]and they rejoiced with her.

59 And it came to pass, that [l]on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child; and they called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.

60 And his mother answered and said, [m]Not so; but he shall be called John.

61 And they said unto her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name.

62 And [n]they made signs to his father, how he would have him called.

63 And he asked for [o]a writing-table, and wrote, saying, His name is John. And they marvelled all.

V. 46—55. (Notes, 1 Sam. 2:1—3.) Mary, being greatly animated with holy affections by Elisabeth's address, and likewise under the immediate influence of the Spirit of prophecy, brake out, as in a transport of joy, admiration, and gratitude; declaring, that her soul did most ardently extol and praise the Lord, and dictate to her tongue, while she celebrated his perfections and extolled his wonderful works; yea, "her spirit" within her exulted and "rejoiced in God her Saviour." By this it is evident, that she confessed herself a sinner, who needed a Saviour, and who could no otherwise rejoice in God, than as she was interested in his salvation through the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Is. 12:2. 45:15—17. Tit. 2:13. 3:4—7.)—It is also supposed by many that by "God my Saviour" she meant that divine Person who was about to receive his human nature from her. (Note, Matt. 1:20,21.) She however added, that the Lord had graciously condescended to regard the "low estate of his handmaiden," who was very poor, obscure, and despised in the world, though descended from the stock of David; when it might have been expected that the Messiah would assume his human nature, from one of more illustrious station, and more honoured among men. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Gen. 32:9—12. 2 Sam. 7:18,19. 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) It was therefore greatly to be admired, that so mean a person should be thus distinguished; for indeed every generation to the end of time would count her happy beyond all other women: as the almighty God, who disposes of his favours as he sees good, had "done great things for her," such as had never before been heard of or experienced: and as his name was holy, and his perfections infinite, so she could not doubt of his accomplishing his promises, and fulfilling his work of mercy, purity, and righteousness, which he had thus begun. Indeed his mercy had always been extended towards "those who feared him," his humble worshippers and servants, in every generation, and would be to the end of the world; and was only withheld from the proud, impenitent and unbelieving. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Ex. 34:5—7. Ps. 103:15—18.)—He had, in former ages, often shown his power in protecting and delivering his people; and in scattering the numerous armies, or formidable confederacies, of his haughty enemies; confounding them even in those sagacious schemes, which they had framed according to the imaginations, or reasonings, of their hearts. (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, 1 Sam. 2:4—8. Job. 5:8—16. 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Thus he had dethroned, or ruined, proud and prosperous monarchs, as Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar; and had exalted such persons as were of low estate and of humble minds, as Joseph, David, and Daniel. (Note, Ps. 113:7—9.) He had also been used to satisfy the poor and hungry with the bounty of his providence, whilst the rich were impoverished and reduced to deep distress: and this was an emblem of the methods of his grace, in abasing the proud and exalting the humble; and in feasting, enriching, and comforting those, who hungered and thirsted for spiritual blessings; whilst the self-wise and self-righteous were left destitute of all real good, and sent away without any communications of light, peace, or holiness to their souls. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 6:21—26. 18:9—14. Ps. 107:8,9.) Thus he had in former ages helped his people Israel, when they humbly cried to him, and succoured them in extreme distress: and thus he was about to help them at that time, by fulfilling his promises concerning the Messiah, when they were sunk very deep in depravity, and in abject subjection to their enemies. This would be done "in remembrance of his mercy," according to his former unmerited kindness to that nation; and in accomplishment of his promises, which he had graciously made to their fathers, especially to Abraham, with relation to himself and his posterity; and that Seed in particular, "in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed." V. 56. After these things, Mary continued with Elisabeth, till the time of her delivery drew near, and then returned to Nazareth. Probably, she left the house of Zacharias at this time, that she might not be in the way of being too much noticed, when so many would be coming to see him and Elisabeth, and to congratulate them on the birth of a son in their old age: but we may be sure, that the communications between these two favoured and pious women, while together, would be peculiarly delightful and edifying to each other.—After Mary's return home, those events seem to have occurred which have already been considered, concerning the difficulties and conduct of Joseph in respect of her. (Notes, Matt. 1:18—21.)

joyful mother of a son, they "rejoiced with her," and congratulated her on so unexpected a blessing. (Marg. Ref. h—l.) On the eighth day many assembled to attend on the circumcision of the child, according to the law: and as it was customary to give children their names at that time, (perhaps with reference to Abram's being called Abraham, when circumcision was appointed,) some of them proposed that the child should be called Zacharias. (Notes, Gen. 17:4—12. 21:1—7.)—We find no instance in the ancient scriptures of any person in Israel, who was called after the name of his father: but it was then become customary; (as in the case of Herod, and his descendants;) and these relations meant it out of respect to Zacharias, especially as he was far advanced in years. But Elisabeth would by no means agree to this, declaring that he should "be called John;" at which they expressed their surprise, as none of the family had been so named. Zacharias, being deaf and dumb, probably spent his time in retirement and devotion, patiently expecting the termination of his chastisement: (Notes, 18—25.) and having given Elisabeth all needful information and instructions concerning the heavenly vision, he seems hitherto to have left the whole matter to her. But the difference of opinion, between her and her friends, caused them by signs to apply to him to determine it: and he, in the same manner, desiring a writing-tablet, wrote that the child's name was John, that being a settled point which was by no means to be disputed.—'God is gracious, which is the import of that name, is a name very fit for him, who was to be the first preacher of the kingdom of grace, and who was to point out him, from whose "fulness we receive grace for grace." (John 1:16.)' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Notes, 11—17. John 1:15—17.)—At this the company was astonished, not having hitherto been acquainted with the particulars of Zacharias's vision; but the time appointed for his correction being now expired, he immediately recovered the gift of speech, and used it in praising God. Probably, he returned thanks to him, for his goodness and faithfulness in the birth of his son, acknowledging the righteousness of the rebuke under which he had lain, and praising the mercy of God, in restoring to him the use of his tongue. It is supposed that the prophetical hymn which follows was spoken at the same time; but this is not certain. Zacharias seems also on this occasion to have made public all the circumstances of the vision that he had in the temple; whence a solemn awe and fear fell on all the neighbours, respecting the event of these extraordinary transactions: and, while they were rumoured abroad through the adjacent country, all who heard them, carefully observed and remembered them, expecting great things from a child, whose birth had been attended by so many wonders. In the meantime John grew up under the immediate protection of God, and the powerful influence of his grace: so that his knowledge and piety, far beyond his years, evinced that the Lord was with him in a peculiar manner. V. 67—75. When Zacharias had recovered the gift of speech, he was also filled with the Holy Spirit, and uttered the following prophecy, concerning the kingdom and salvation of the Messiah. (Note, 46—55.)—He began with blessing and praising "the Lord God of Israel," especially, for again visiting his people in mercy, after having for a long time left them without inspired prophets; and having begun that work of redemption, which had so long been predicted and expected in the birth of him, who was to be the forerunner of the Messiah; which was a certain proof that he himself would shortly appear. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) So that, speaking of the Saviour as already come, according to the language frequently used by the prophets, he declared that God had "raised up an Horn of salvation for" his people. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 1 Sam. 2:10. 2 Sam. 22:2,3. Ps. 132:17.) The horn, which is the ornament, and weapon of protection and annoyance of every enemy, in many animals, is an apt emblem of the divine Saviour; "the glory of his people," their Defender against every assailant, who makes them, "in all things more than conquerors."—This salvation God had "raised up in the house of his servant David," even Jesus, the Son of the virgin Mary. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Ps. 89:1—4,19—37. Is. 7:14. 9:6,7. 11:1. Jer. 23:5,6.) His birth, character, and salvation would accomplish the predictions of the holy prophets, from the beginning of the world; all of whom, in one way or other, gave intimations of the promised Messiah; and assured the people of God, that by him they should be "saved from their enemies," and protected against all those wicked men and apostate spirits, who hated them and sought their destruction. So that the coming of this Saviour was intended to "perform" the mercy, which God had been bestowing on their ancestors for ages past; and to accomplish the gracious and faithful covenant, which he had entered into with believers under all preceding dispensations; from the first promise made to fallen Adam: and which he had ratified to Abraham by a solemn oath, in behalf of himself and all his spiritual seed; the blessings of which were also shadowed forth under external signs and advantages, secured to his natural posterity. This promise, covenant, and oath, engaged to all believers, deliverance from the power of Satan, sin, the world, death, and every enemy, as well as redemption from the curse of the holy law and the righteous vengeance of God: that, being safe under his protection, and partakers of his mercy and grace, they might worship and serve him, as under his immediate eye, "without fear" of being destroyed by their foes, or cast off by him, "in all righteousness and holiness" during the remainder of their lives in this world; and so at length inherit eternal felicity in heaven. nonour of being that "prophet of the most high God," who was appointed to "go before the face of the Lord," even of Christ, "to prepare his ways." (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, 11—17. Matt. 11:7—15.) The grand object of his preparatory ministry would be, to give the "knowledge of salvation," by the sure testimony and faithful promise of God, "to his people," through the full remission of all sins to every one who believed in Christ; and by this assurance to call men to repent, and accept of this inestimable blessing, that they might have the experience of it in their own souls, and know themselves to be partakers of it. (Notes, 1 John 5:9—13.) All these benefits would come to them "through the tender mercy," or bowels of compassion, of Israel's God; who, pitying the misery of perishing sinners, had caused this Day-spring from heaven to visit them, ushering in the appearance of "the Sun of righteousness," and the evangelical dispensation. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, Is. 60:1—3. Mal. 2:2,3. 2 Pet. 1:19. Rev. 22:16,17.) Thus, light would be afforded to sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, whose ignorance, guilt, and misery, resembled the darkness of a dungeon, in which condemned criminals are confined; and whose dreary situation was like the dark shade of death and hell. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 4:12—17. Acts 26:16—18.) Then would their minds be enlightened, and their path marked out; they would see their danger and their refuge; they would be inspired with hope and encouragement; they would be directed into the way of peace with God, with their consciences, and with each other; and would learn to walk in those holy and happy paths, which lead to everlasting peace and felicity, and are an earnest of them. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, Is. 59:3—8. Rom. 3:9—18. 5:1,2.)—This was evidently a very remarkable prophecy, describing the nature, privileges, and effects of the salvation of the gospel; and foretelling the success of Christianity both among the Jews and Gentiles. Probably, it was much circulated, and attended to, among Zacharias's friends, and the pious remnant of the nation.

V. 80. As John grew in stature, his understanding and judgment matured: and he gave indications not only of superior natural abilities, and energy of mind; but also of strong faith, vigorous holy affections, great fortitude and resolution in the cause of God, a superiority to grovelling desires and pursuits, and a victory over the fear and love of the world. Thus did he ripen for usefulness: but whether his parents died whilst he was young, or whether they were specially directed by God in this matter; he seems neither to have received an education from the Jewish scribes, nor attended on any sacerdotal services at the temple; but to have lived privately in the most retired and unfrequented part of the country, being given up to meditation, devotion, and mortification, till the time when he openly appeared among the people as the Messiah's forerunner. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. Those things, which we are required "most surely to believe," are most abundantly proved to be of divine original; and if our faith were as strong as the truths and promises are certain, we should continually rejoice in them. For the great transactions, on which our hopes depend, have been recorded, not only by such as "from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word;" but by those who were guided by the inspiration of God: this was attested by the miracles which they wrought, and by the prophecies interwoven with their histories, and fulfilled from age to age in the most evident manner. We should therefore endeavour to get acquainted with the "certainty of those things, which are most surely believed" by all true Christians, and to obtain a more exact knowledge of them; and also labour to bring our friends and neighbours to an established faith in them. This is the way to approve ourselves to be indeed "Lovers of God,' and to fill up our station in the community to his glory. Thus we shall evidently be "righteous before him," and not merely in the opinion of our fellow mortals: and an habitual tenor of conscientious and blameless obedience to all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, forms the best proof of our gracious justification, and the best ornament of "the doctrine of God our Saviour." (Note, Tit. 2:9,10.) This is peculiarly needful and becoming in those who sustain the office of ministers: and it is a singular felicity when married persons are of one heart in the worship and service of God. Yet some alloy to our comfort must be expected in every situation; and this consideration should reconcile us to our own trials; as we probably should be no gainers, could we exchange condition with those whom we are most apt to envy. But those who "grow in grace" as they advance in years, and who steadily attend to their proper employment, may hope for increasing peace and comfort in the eve of life. (Notes, Ps. 71:17—24. 92:13—15.)

V. 8—25. While by faith we view our great High-Priest in the temple above, continually presenting the prayers of believers before his Father's throne, with the fragrant incense of his intercession; and are encouraged to join our petitions to those of multitudes all over the earth, who every hour are approaching the mercy-seat by this "new and living Way:" (Note, Heb. 10:19—22.) let us also recollect how terrifying to our frail sinful nature, the appearance of visitants from the world of spirits has always been; that we may be thankful for the invisible ministry of angels, and that the Lord sends his messages to us by men like ourselves, whose "terror cannot make us afraid." (Notes, Job 4:12—16. 33:1—7.) We need, however, fear no evil, but may expect glad tidings from heaven, when we are found in the path of duty: and if our prayers be accepted, all blessings will in due time be communicated. Nor should delays in this respect be construed into denials; many prayers which we have been offering during years which are past, for ourselves and others, may be abundantly answered after we are gone to heaven. We ought not indeed to be anxious about having children; for we know not whether they would be cause of "joy and gladness," to us and to others, or the contrary: since it is obvious, that numbers seem to live only to render the world more wicked and miserable than it would otherwise have been; and then they die in such a manner, that we cannot but think it would have been "better for them if they had never been born." Yet it is a peculiar favour to have children, for whose birth many shall have cause to rejoice, as instruments of God in doing good to others, and being themselves heirs of eternal life and happiness. In seeking such distinguishing blessings for those who belong to us, we should carefully observe the difference between a great man in the world's esteem, and one who is "great in the sight of the LORD." The mighty conquerors, potentates, and statesmen, and all who have been renowned as philosophers, or men of exalted genius; as well as all the sons of affluence, ostentation, and magnificence, are mean and obscure persons, in the judgment of God, compared with a poor prophet or minister, who is filled with wisdom and zeal; who is superior to the smiles and frowns of the world; who wants none of its honours, advantages, or pleasures; and whose only employment and joy it is to bring sinners to repentance, to "turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just," and to call on men to believe in Christ, and prepare for his coming to judge the world. Some measure of this kind of greatness we may desire for our children; and with that view we should early devote them to God, and bring them up for him: and, as some have been "filled with the Holy Spirit from their mother's womb;" we should hope and pray that our's may thus be changed, in early youth, by divine grace; and we ought to instruct them in the truth, as soon as they are capable of knowing good from evil. Nor should we forget, that early and constant temperance, and indifference about worldly pleasures, are proper indications of future eminence and usefulness; that the increase of true godliness tends to the termination of contentions in families, churches, and communities; and that nominal Christians in general need conversion to the real worship and service of God, as much as the heathen; even as Israelites by birth did of old.—Even real believers are not always alike strong in faith: when they lose sight of the power, truth, and love of God, and perplex themselves with difficulties and impediments, they are apt to dishonour him by unbelief: thus the glad tidings and precious promises of his word become the occasion to them of sin and correction; the very messengers of his mercy are constrained to give them intimations of his displeasure; the accomplishment of his promises are attended by rebukes; and their mouths are stopped in silence and confusion, when otherwise they would have been praising God with the voice of joy and gratitude. It is good, however, even under divine chastisement, to go on with our work, as far as we are able: for thus our afflictions may be mitigated and sanctified, and returning mercies will be preparing for us. But when we are peculiarly favoured, we should shun all ostentation: and every interposition of the Lord, to take away reproach or trouble, should remind us to court retirement, that we may meditate on his goodness and truth, pour out our thanksgivings before him, and seek his gracious teaching and assistance, in order to a due improvement of his mercies.

CHAPTER II.

Joseph and Mary go to Bethlehem, to be enrolled there, according to the decree of Augustus, 1—3. Jesus is there born and laid in a manger, 6, 7. An angel makes this known to shepherds; and the heavenly host praise God in their hearing, 8—14. The shepherds, finding it to be as the angel had said, report these transactions, and glorify God, 15—20. Jesus is circumcised, 21; and presented at the temple, with the accustomed sacrifice of the poor, for the purifying of Mary, 22—24. Simeon's prophecy concerning him, 25—35: and that of Anna, 36—38. He grows and increases in wisdom, 39, 40. At twelve years of age he goes with his parents to Jerusalem, and hears and asks questions of the doctors in the temple, 41—50. He returns to Nazareth, and is subject to his parents, 51, 52.

V. 26—38. Whilst we contemplate the peculiar honour which was conferred on the Virgin-mother of our Lord, we should remember that angels rejoice over every sinner who repenteth; they deem those "highly favoured" in whose hearts "Christ dwells by faith," and are ready to congratulate each believer on so important a blessing. (Notes, 2:8—14. Eph. 1:3—8.) Happy indeed must they be, among the sons and daughters of Adam, to whom the Lord is graciously reconciled, and with whom he is present by his sanctifying Spirit! They may indeed be troubled and perplexed by many things, of which they read and hear; and they can scarcely raise their hopes so high, as to expect the blessings intended for them: but they shall, in due season, be raised above their fears, and assured that they have "found favour with God," as most nearly related to "the Saviour of the world." (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. P. O. 31—40.) Let us then rejoice in his personal and mediatorial exaltation; for he now reigns not only "over the house of Jacob;" but over "angels, principalities, and powers in heavenly places," as "the Son of God" and "the Son of David." Let us seek to be, and to approve ourselves, the subjects of "his kingdom of which there shall be no end;" and if we meet with sufferings in the way to the full enjoyment of our privileges and felicity; let us remember how Jesus was abased, impoverished, reproached, rejected, and crucified, before he entered into his glory. We should therefore entirely rely on the promises of God, carefully observe his directions, and diligently keep his commandments: for, waiting on him in this manner, the Holy Spirit, by whose operation the human nature of Jesus, "the First-born among many brethren," was formed in the Virgin's womb, will gradually renew his image on our souls, that we too, in a subordinate sense, may be "the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty." (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14—18, v. 18. 7:1.)—In all our conflicts and temptations we should still remember, that "with God nothing shall be impossible;" and when we read and hear his promises, we should turn them into prayers, saying, "Behold the servant of the Lord, let it be unto me according to this thy word."

V. 39—56. Those who are experienced in the things of God, will delight in each other's company; they will take pleasure in speaking together of "what the Lord hath done for their souls," and in joining in grateful praises and fervent prayers; they will value each other's pious counsels, cautions, and exhortations; and not decline that labour, which is requisite, in order to this 'communion of the saints.'—The influences of the Spirit of God effectually counteract that emulation and ambition, to which we are naturally prone, and through which we forget our own mercies, by repining at the superior honour conferred on others. His holy consolations raise us above the petty disparities of external rank and station: in proportion to his sacred illumination, we feel our own unworthiness, learn thankfulness for every favour, and rejoice in the gifts and graces bestowed on others: and thus "in honour preferring them to ourselves," we deem ourselves highly distinguished by the company of those believers, whom, under another influence, we should, perhaps disdainfully, have looked down upon as our inferiors. (Notes, Rom. 12:9—16, vv. 10,16. Phil. 2:1—4.) Indeed, true honour consists in our relation and conformity to Christ: we ought therefore to rejoice in the company of those, who are evidently thus dignified; and to commend that faith and obedience, which tend in a measure even to reflect disgrace on our own less honourable conduct, or on that of such as are most dear to us. Yet humble believers will appropriate no glory to themselves; but will take occasion, from congratulations and commendations, to "magnify the Lord," and to "rejoice in him" as their "God and Saviour," with their whole heart and soul. Notwithstanding every other distinction, they must have been for ever miserable without this salvation: their thankfulness will therefore always be connected with an humble sense of sinfulness, and of his mercy, who has looked down with pity on their low estate, and raised them to the hope of everlasting happiness. Indeed, the almighty God "whose name is holy," might have been expected to do great things against us guilty and polluted criminals: but he has greatly glorified even his holiness, in extending mercy to all them that fear him, in every age and nation. Proud infidels and Pharisees, and presumptuous sinners of every description, will be "scattered" by this powerful arm, and disappointed in the vain "imaginations of their hearts;" and haughty potentates will be cast down from their thrones, into everlasting shame and misery: but the broken-hearted sinner, who abases himself before God, shall be exalted; and our gracious Lord will satisfy the desires of the poor in spirit, who long for spiritual blessings; whilst the rich and self-sufficient shall be "sent empty away." This is the true reason, why so many frequent those ordinances in vain, from which others go away abundantly satisfied, and rejoicing in the goodness of the Lord. For he still helps his true Israel, nor shall the believing seed of Abraham be ashamed for ever.

V. 57—66. We should trace back every rill of comfort to the full fountain of the Lord's mercy, which he is continually magnifying. Delays often render the benefit doubly precious, by increasing our admiration and gratitude: and it is beautiful, when believers so behave, that all their neighbours cordially rejoice in the tokens of the divine favour towards them.—When the promises of God are performed, as well as while we are waiting for them, we should keep close to his ordinances nor should we be influenced by any counsels, expostulations or examples, to deviate in the least from his commandments; but should study, by every method, to perpetuate the remembrance of his mercies to us. At the removal of our chastisements, our mouths should be open to show forth the praises of the Lord: thus it will be known, that we approve the justice of the correction, as well as admire the mercy which has terminated it; and that we have derived benefit from our sufferings. We ought likewise to observe the dealings of God with our neighbours, and wait the event of his dispensations with attentive expectation: and when our children grow up healthy, and improve in the exercise of their faculties; we should ascribe it to the good "hand of the Lord upon them," and take occasion to entreat him to give them also his heavenly grace and wisdom.

V. 67—80. What multiplied praises, in heaven and earth, did the Saviour's advent occasion! Shall not we also unite in blessing "the LORD God of Israel, who hath thus visited and redeemed his people?" We are as deeply concerned in the "raising up of this Horn of Salvation," and in the redemption which he made for sinners with his blood, as the Jews of old were. The predictions of holy prophets being fulfilled in Christ, confirm the truth of the Scriptures to us, as well as to them; the covenant and oath of God to Abraham, were intended to give us "a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us." Even John the Baptist's ministry still calls on us to repent, and welcome our incarnate Prince and Saviour: the whole Scripture gives assurance of salvation to all believers, "by the remission of their sins:" and "through the tender mercy of our God, this Day-spring from on high hath visited" these distant nations, to give light to us benighted pagans, who "sat in darkness and the shadow of death." But let us remember, that this salvation implies "a deliverance from our enemies, and from all that hate us;" that, being set at liberty from bondage, as well as from condemnation, we "may serve God without fear," under the influence of the Spirit of adoption, "in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our" future "lives." Is this then the salvation we desire? Do we experience its power in our hearts and consciences? Do we use the light of the gospel "to guide us into the ways of peace" and purity? If this be our case, we may be thankful and joyful, and expect complete victory over Satan, sin, and death, and an abundant entrance into heavenly felicity. Let us then take encouragement from the "knowledge of salvation," brought to us in the holy Scriptures, to repent, and mortify every sin: let us assert our Christian liberty by being the diligent servants of God, whose 'service is perfect freedom;' let us fear nothing but sin and temptation, and the consequences of them; let us pray that the light which shines around us may shine into our hearts, and appear in our lives; and let us "follow peace with all men," as well as seek peace with God and our own consciences. If it be the will of the Lord that we should live in obscurity, let us the more diligently seek to grow "strong in the grace of Jesus Christ:" and let those who are preparing for public usefulness, live retired and mortified to the world; employing their time in useful studies, attended by searching the Scriptures, by meditation and devotion, till the Lord shall open their way to some proper service for the benefit of his people, and the enlargement, purity, and peace of his kingdom.

resided at Nazareth, the distance of sixty or seventy miles from that city; and she continued there till far advanced in her pregnancy. She was not, however, directed to go to Bethlehem; indeed that would have appeared too much the effect of design. But Augustus Cæsar, the Roman emperor, being left to follow the dictates of his own ambition, rapacity, or policy, issued an edict, that an account should be taken of the number and degree of all the subjects in his extensive empire; (marg.) which in a vainglorious style was then commonly called, "all the world," or the whole habitable earth; (Marg. Ref. b.) because it contained all the most civilized and best cultivated regions which were then known. Some interpreters indeed suppose, that only the whole land of Israel, which was then governed by king Herod, and which was soon after divided into several distinct provinces, was included in this edict; and that it was issued on account of some umbrage that Herod had given Augustus. But this gives a very restricted interpretation of the word translated "all the world;" of which no indisputable instances have been produced.—'Such an account used to be taken of the citizens of Rome every fifth year, and they had officers on purpose appointed for it, called censors. Their business was to take an account, and make a register, of all the Roman citizens, their wives and children, with the age, qualities, trades, offices, and estates, real and personal, of all of them. Augustus first extended this to the provinces. ... Three times, during his reign, he caused the like description to be made. ... The second is the description which St. Luke refers to. The decree concerning it was issued out ... three years before that in which Christ was born. So long had the taking of this ... survey been carrying on through Syria, Cœle-syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, before it came to Bethlehem. ... Joab was nine months and twenty days in taking an account only of ten of the tribes of Israel, and of no more in them than of the men that were fit for the wars. (2 Sam. 24:8.) ... And when a survey ... was ordered by William the Conqueror to be taken for England only, I mean that of the Doomsday-book, it was six years in making. ... No payment of any tax was made, (on this survey,) till the twelfth year after; till then Herod, and after him Archelaus, his son, reigning in Judea. ... But when ... Archelaus was deposed, and Judea put under the command ... and government of a Roman procurator, then first were taxes paid the Romans for that country. ... If it be asked, for what reason then was this survey or description of Judea made, if no taxes were then to be paid upon it? The answer is, he was then at work on the composure of a book, containing such a survey and description of the whole Roman empire, as that which our Doomsday-book doth for England. In order whereto his decree for this survey ... was made to extend to the depending kingdoms, as well as the provinces of the empire: that he might have a full account of both, for the thorough completing of the work. ... However, taxes were by the people of the provinces only paid to the Romans, and those of the dependent kingdoms to their own proper princes; ... the people paid their taxes to their princes, and the princes paid their tribute to the Roman Emperors.' Prideaux.—It is plain from this account, that the sceptre was at least departing from Judah, when Christ was born. (Note, Gen. 49:10.)

V 2. 'It is added, that this was "the first enrolling," to distinguish it from another; (Acts 5:37.) the same which Josephus and Eusebius speak of, and place under Cyrenius also; but differing from this here. As for Cyrenius having rule over Syria at this time, that is to be taken in a looser, not stricter sense. Not that Cyrenius was there now the standing governor under the Romans; but sent by the emperor particularly on this occasion to take an inventory of this part of the empire. So saith Suidas, ... out of some ancient author: Cæsar Augustus, desiring to know the strength and state of his dominions, sent twenty chosen men, ... one into one part, another into another, to take this account, and Publius Sulpitius Quirinius had Syria for his province.' Hammond.—'Justin Martyr cals this Cyrenius the first procurator of Cæsar in Judea; namely on this account, that he was sent to make this survey, in Judea and Syria, even during the life of Herod the great.' Beza.—Saturninus was the resident governor of Syria at this time, and Tertullian says, that this survey was intrusted to him: and it is doubted by learned men, whether the words rendered "was governor" were ever used in that sense, which the above interpretation requires.—'When Judea was put under ... a Roman procurator, then first were taxes paid to the Romans for that country; Publius Sulpitius Quirinius, who is in Greek called Cyrenius, being governor, that is, president of Syria. ... There were two distinct particular actions, in this matter, done at two distinct and different times; the first, the making the description or survey, and the second the levying the tax thereupon. And what is in the first verse of the second chapter of St. Luke, is to be understood of the former of these, and what is in the second verse, only of the latter. And this reconciles that evangelist with Josephus; for it is manifest from that author, that Cyrenius was not governor of Syria, or any tax levied on Judea, till Archelaus was deposed. ... And therefore the making of this description cannot be that which was done while Cyrenius was governor of Syria: but the other particular, that is, the laying and levying the tax thereon certainly was.' Prideaux.—'This was the first enrolment made by Quirinius, governor of Syria.' Lardner. This very learned author, who has fully discussed the subject, supposes that there were two enrolments made by Quirinius; and that he is called the governor of Syria, though not then advanced to that dignity, because he was afterwards thus distinguished: and there seems no objection to this conclusion, except the testimony of Tertullian, above mentioned, which is far from being entitled to implicit credence.—The second enrolment, or the levying of the taxes on the Jews, after the deposition of Archelaus, excited most dreadful commotions, and was an introduction to those seditions and insurrections, which at length brought destruction on Jerusalem, and unspeakable calamities on the Jews.

V. 3—7. Thus it pleased God to take occasion, by the determination of a heathen prince, to accomplish his own purposes and predictions, in the most natural and simple manner: for, as all persons were required to resort to the city to which the family had belonged: it became incumbent on Joseph and Mary, being the lineal descendants of David, to go to Bethlehem for this purpose. If, as some think, Mary's situation might have excused her from so long a journey, it must be supposed, that she was divinely directed not to avail herself of that excuse.—When they arrived at Bethlehem; it is probable, that they were obliged to wait some time, before it came to their turn to be enrolled: in the interval Mary was delivered of her first-born Son; (Marg. Ref. f—n. Note, Matt. 1:24,25.) and was so strengthened, as to be able herself to wrap him in such clothes, as she could there procure, and to "lay him in a manger" instead of a cradle.—'By her doing this herself, it is thought that her labour was without the usual pangs of child-birth.' Whithy.—As the city was then crowded with strangers, many of whom were doubtless in superior circumstances, and as Joseph and Mary were poor people; "there was no room for them in the inn," nor was any person disposed to give them a hospitable reception. Thus "the Saviour of the world," "the Lord of glory," made his first appearance (as Man) in a stable, or some kind of out-building, and his first bed in a manger! This was an emblem of the reception which he was to meet with on earth, and of the external poverty and debasement in which he would pass through life. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—It is probable, that Jesus also would be enrolled, and thus his birth at Bethlehem authentically registered.—It is generally supposed, that there was only one inn of the superior sort at Bethlehem, which was at this time an inconsiderable place: and many think, that the word rendered "stable," does not mean a place exclusively allotted to cattle; but an inferior sort of receptacle for poor travellers, in which they, and the animals which brought them, were accommodated meanly, under the same roof.—Certainly the customs in those countries differed widely from our manners; and some notice should be taken of this: but a large proportion of what has been copiously written on this subject, has arisen from a carnal notion, that so mean a nativity did not become "the Lord of glory." V. 8—14. 'As Abraham and David, to whom the promise of the Messiah was first made, were shepherds;' (Moses likewise might have been added, Note, Ex. 2:21) 'so was the completion of this promise first revealed to shepherds. ...

10 And the angel said unto them, [u]Fear not: [v]for, behold, [x]I bring you good tidings of great [y]joy, which shall be [z]to all people.

These flocks being kept in the field, the shepherds watched severally in their courses, to preserve them from thieves, and wild beasts; and had there little cottages erected for that purpose.' Whitby.—The birth of our Lord was attended with circumstances of external indigence and meanness: but it was also marked with a dignity and majesty, far surpassing all the pomp of kings, and the splendour of palaces and retinues; and suited to pour contempt on all human grandeur.—It was proper that so important an event should be announced with peculiar solemnity, and angels were the heralds of the new-born Saviour: but they were not sent to the rulers of the nation, or to the priests, scribes, and Pharisees: on the contrary, some poor, humble, industrious shepherds were favoured with the first tidings of Emmanuel's birth. (Note, Matt. 2:1,2.) These were spending the night, or part of it, in the field, keeping watch over their flocks, to defend them from robbers and beasts of prey; and probably there was a number of them, who watched by turns. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q.) While they were thus employed a holy angel suddenly appeared, and "the glory of the Lord," even of his manifested presence, surrounded them. (Marg Ref. r, s.) This threw them into great consternation; but the angel encouraged them not to fear, for he was come to bring them good tidings, which would be the source of great and lasting joy to them, and "to all people:" for to them, as men, as sinners, and as believers, was born on that day, at Bethlehem, a Saviour from wrath, Satan, sin, and death, who was indeed the promised and expected Messiah, Israel's anointed Prophet, Priest, and King; nay, "the Lord of glory," "the Lord of all," "the Lord from heaven," "God manifest in the flesh." (Marg. Ref. u—c. Notes, Is. 7:14. 9:6,7.) This great and invaluable blessing to mankind, this glorious new-born Prince and Saviour, they might find "wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and lying in a manger:" and they might surely know him by this sign; for probably no other babe could be found at Bethlehem in so mean a situation. No sooner had the angel finished this address to the poor shepherds, than he was visibly joined by "a multitude of the heavenly host," or of the angelic armies; who, being filled with inexpressible admiration of the love of God, and the display of all his glorious perfections, in this surprising transaction, audibly celebrated his praises with triumphant acclamations, saying, "Glory to God in the highest, &c." implying that this was the grand display of the divine glory, and superior to all others which they had ever witnessed. (19:38.) They therefore called on all the inhabitants of the highest heavens, to praise God in their loftiest strains of adoration: for now peace was prepared for the earth, which had so long lain in a state of rebellion, enmity, discord and misery: peace inward and outward, with God and with each other, would be found on earth, through the gracious work of the divine Peace-maker, whom the Father, out of "good-will to men," fallen men, had provided and sent among them. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, John 3:16. Rom. 5:7—10. Eph. 1:3—8. 2:14—18. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 5:11—14. 20:4—6.)—'So rich and free is the good-will of God to fallen men; and such blessed peace, external and internal, will eventually be produced on earth; that the glory of God will be more displayed and adored, in this, than in all his other works.' This seems the purport of these angelic praises; but the abrupt, sententious manner, in which they were delivered, whilst it rendered them more suited to their fervent acclamations, increases the difficulty of unfolding the full meaning of each expression. V. 15—20. When the angels had rendered their joyful adorations of God, and benevolent congratulations to men, on this most happy occasion, the vision disappeared: and the shepherds, conferring together on the wonders which they had witnessed, determined to go immediately to Bethlehem; where they were soon enabled to find Mary, Joseph, and the new-born Saviour, exactly in the situation which had been described. Having witnessed this instructive scene, they publicly reported the whole transaction, and the assurance given them that this child was "the Saviour," even "Christ, the Lord." This excited the astonishment of all who heard it: but most of them seem to have speedily forgotten it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—o.) Mary, however, carefully observed, and meditated on, all these wonderful incidents, which were so suited to enlarge her expectations and enliven her holy affections: and the shepherds returned to their humble employment, with joyful, thankful hearts, glorifying and blessing God for his distinguished favours to them. This painful ordinance was, in his case, a pledge given of his future perfect obedience to the whole law, (Gal. 5:3.) in the midst of sufferings and temptations, even unto death for us; and it was an entrance on that vicarious work which he finished on the cross.—The name Jesus has already been explained. V. 25—32. The Jewish priests and scribes remained ignorant of the birth of the promised Messiah, till some time after this. (Notes, Matt. 2:1—12.) But there was a small remnant, who had more spiritual views and expectations; and to them it pleased God to give intimations of what had taken place. Among these was Simeon; concerning whom many vain conjectures have been formed by those who would represent the eminent believers mentioned in the Bible, as persons who stood very high in the world's esteem: but we know no more of him than what is here recorded. He was strictly just and upright in his whole conduct, and a devoted worshipper of God; yet he did not rest in these attainments; but expected the coming of the Messiah, as "the consolation of Israel," and the source of all their hopes and comforts. (Notes, 36—38. Acts 10:1,2.) Simeon was likewise endued with the Spirit of prophecy; (which had begun to be restored, after a suspension of nearly four hundred years, from the days of Malachi;) and by immediate inspiration he was assured, that he should not die, till "he had seen the Lord's Christ," or Anointed, the promised Messiah. Thus, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, he came to the temple, at the very time when Joseph and Mary presented Jesus there; and so he witnessed the first accomplishment of a very remarkable prophecy concerning him. (Note, Hag. 2:6—9.) Seeing, therefore, the infant Redeemer, and knowing who he was by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he "took him in his arms," and "blessed God" for his mercies to him and to his people; expressing himself willing, nay, desirous, to die, seeing the Lord now "let him depart in peace," having favoured him with the sight of "his Salvation." (Marg. Ref. y—g. Notes, Is. 12:2. 45:8,15—17,20—25. Hos. 1:6,7. Zech. 9:9,10. Matt. 1:20,21. Acts 4:5—12. Tit. 2:13,14. 3:4—7.) The Lord Jesus himself is here called "the Salvation of God," because the whole salvation of a sinner centres in his person, as "God manifest in the flesh;" all the purposes and promises of salvation had reference to him; he obtained all the blessings of it by shedding his blood; they are all treasured up in him, and dispensed by him to believers; and they are all applied, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, who is given to us through his intercession. —Thus Simeon acknowledged Jesus "as God's Salvation, which he had prepared before the face of all people;" as the Lord intended to exhibit him publicly, before all nations, by the preaching of the gospel: for, as "the Light of the world," (Notes, Is. 9:2. 42:5—7. 49:5,6. 60:1—3. John 1:4—9. 3:19—21. 8:12. 12:34—36.) he was intended to illuminate all nations by his doctrine and grace, and also to be "the Glory of his people Israel." The chief honour of that nation consisted in having given birth to this glorious Saviour; and all true believers deem their relation to him their grand distinction, and learn to glory in him alone. (Marg. Ref. k, m —p. Notes, Rom. 9:4,5. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.)—No doubt the Spirit of prophecy opened to Simeon's enlarged view, the glorious and blessed consequences, both to Israel, and the Gentiles, in all subsequent generations, arising from the birth of the child which he held in his arms: and joyfully anticipating these glories and blessings, he counted himself to have lived long enough upon earth, and was ready for the society, worship, and joy of heaven, to join the songs of "the heavenly host," who had before sang at his birth, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men." (14)- 'It is wonderful that, after so many clear prophecies, in the Old Testament, of the calling of the Gentiles, the Jews should have been all so blind, as to imagine God had no kindness for them.' Whithy. It is likewise worth inquiring, in this view, how far the bulk of professed Christians also may be blinded by prejudice, concerning many things as plainly revealed in the New Testament.

V. 33—35. While Joseph and Mary were astonished at the words which Simeon addressed to the Infant in his arms he blessed them also, praying for them and expressing his satisfaction in their felicity. (Marg. Ref. r.) He then assured his mother, that her Son was placed for "the fall and rising again of many in Israel." Many of them would reject, despise, persecute, and crucify him, through the pride and enmity of their hearts against the truth: thus they would fall into sin and under condemnation, and this would terminate in the temporal ruin of the nation, as well as in the perdition of many souls: but, at the same time, numbers of those who had sunk deep into error, profligacy, and impiety; yea, many who at first rejected and persecuted him, would at length repent, and by faith in him would obtain pardon, and so be raised up again to "walk in newness of life." Yet he would be set "for a sign which should be spoken against," the very butt of contradiction and opposition to all orders and descriptions of men. His external meanness, his holy character, his humbling doctrine, and his spiritual salvation, proved equally offensive to the Pharisees and Sadducees; and interfered as much with the reputation, interests, and authority of the hypocritical priests and scribes, as with the carnal prejudices of the nation in general. Notwithstanding the distinguished honour conferred on Mary, she must expect to witness such things, from the cruelty and enmity of the people and rulers against her Son, as would, like a sword, pierce her soul with the most exquisite anguish. This must have been emphatically the case, when she stood by the cross on which he suffered. (Notes, Ps. 42:9,10. John 19:25—27.)—It is also probable that she was exposed to persecution among the primitive Christians: and some of the ancients report that she at length died a martyr; but this must be allowed to be uncertain.—The event of the ministry of Jesus, and of the dispensation which he came to introduce, would also be that "the thoughts of many hearts would be revealed," or the imaginations and reasonings which secretly occupied men's minds detected. The plausible characters of numbers would thus be shown to be leavened with pride, malice, covetousness, and hypocrisy; while the humility, faith, and piety of others, who had been disregarded, would thus be brought forth and made manifest. (Marg. Ref. s—y.)—This, &c. (34) 'Neither look that he shall be applauded of all; yea, rather, he shall be as a common mark, whereat the arrows of con-

V. 36—38. The Lord was pleased to confirm Simeon's testimony to Christ, by that of Anna. She was a prophetess, and probably known to be so. (Marg. Ref. z.)—Phanuel seems to have been an eminent person of the tribe of Asher. Anna, having lost her husband in the prime of her life, continued a widow to her death. Some think that eighty-four years had elapsed from the death of her husband; others suppose her to have been eighty-four years of age. She resided near the temple, that she might attend on all its sacred ordinances; and, having no relative engagements to occupy her attention, she spent her whole time in the worship and service of God: and, joining frequent fastings with her constant prayers and supplications, for herself and her people, she employed the day, and often part of the night also, in these religious exercises; not desisting from them even on account of the infirmities of advanced age. (Marg. Ref. a —d. Notes, Dan. 9:2,3. 10:2,3. 1 Tim. 5:5,6.) This devoted person came into the temple at the same time, when Simeon was speaking concerning Jesus; and she also returned thanks to God for sending the promised Saviour, and for favouring her with a sight of him: and she spake of him to all the pious remnant, with whom she was acquainted, and who waited for a spiritual redemption in Jerusalem: for most of the citizens were looking only for a temporal prince and deliverer. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, 25—32.)

See on Matt. 11:25,26. She confessed in concert with Simeon to the Lord Christ, (κῳ Κυριῳ,) and spake of him. Some think, that she addressed the infant Jesus as Simeon had done.

V. 39. After these remarkable occurrences, and the completion of all things respecting Jesus and Mary, according to the law, Joseph and Mary left Jerusalem; and it is said that "they returned ... to Nazareth:" but St. Luke passes over the coming of the wise men, and the flight of the holy family into Egypt; for it is evident, that this return to Nazareth did not occur till some time afterwards. Probably they returned to Bethlehem, supposing that Jesus was there to be educated. After some time the wise men arrived, and then, by the divine monition, they fled into Egypt, and on their return went to reside at Nazareth. (Notes, Matt. 2:)

V. 40. Jesus grew in strength and stature like other children; and at the same time "waxed strong in spirit." (Note, 1:80.) It was manifest, that as the faculties of his human soul unfolded, all holy affections and dispositions became proportionably vigorous: he was also filled with wisdom and knowledge, and all his words and actions were regulated in perfect conformity to the divine law, so that the special favour of God evidently rested on him.—As to the manner in which the indwelling Deity gradually communicated knowledge, wisdom, and holiness to the human nature of Christ, we must confess that we know nothing. "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh." (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) That, as Man, his wisdom and knowledge could not be infinite, or incapable of increase, we know: but how the union was formed, or the communications imparted, we cannot, in the smallest degree comprehend or explain. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 41—52. These verses contain all which the Spirit of God has seen good to record, concerning the childhood and youth of the divine Saviour: though we should have expected fuller information; and desired a more adequate gratification of our curiosity, on so extraordinary a subject. Joseph, his father-in-law, and Mary his mother, used to go up to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Ex. 23:14—18. Deut. 16:1—17. 1 Sam. 1:3, 19—22.) Perhaps Joseph went up at the other great feasts, but, though the women were not required, Mary, and many others who loved the ordinances of God, used to attend at the feast of the passover. And when Jesus was twelve years old, he went up with them; for it seems to have been the custom for young persons to accompany their parents at that age. When the days of unleavened bread were expired, they set out on their return home: and as great numbers came to Jerusalem from every part of the country, they journeyed in a great company, for mutual security: so that they departed without the child Jesus, who stayed behind; being engaged with the sacred ordinances and conversation which attended the observation of the festival. Perhaps there was some culpable inattention in Joseph and Mary: for they took it for granted that he was in the company, among some of their neighbours and relations, who, doubtless, greatly delighted in his conversation, so that they travelled a whole day's journey before they missed him. But when in the evening the several families separated for the night, they could not find him: and they returned to Jerusalem, with great anxiety and under many apprehensions. At length, however, after two days spent in journeying and returning, on the third day, probably towards night, they found him: not in the house of any acquaintance, nor in such places as young people generally frequent; but in some court, or chamber, of the temple, sitting amidst the doctors or teachers of the law; diligently hearkening to their discussions and instructions, modestly proposing questions to them on various subjects, and pertinently answering the inquiries which were put to him: and this he did with such wisdom and propriety, that all who heard him were astonished and delighted with him. (Marg. Ref. s—x.)-Thus he was pleased to emit some beams of his heavenly light and glory, even in his early youth; both to raise the expectation of the Jews, and to give a proper example to young people, for the regulation of their inquiries, employments, and behaviour.—The common expression by which he is represented, as 'disputing with the doctors,' is calculated to give wrong ideas on the subject, and very contrary to those which naturally present themselves to the mind on reading this account. 'Not one word is said of his disputing, by the evangelist, ... but only of his asking some questions, and answering others, which was a very usual thing in these assemblies, and indeed the very end of them. All was no doubt conducted with the utmost modesty and decorum. And if he, (Jesus) 'were with others at the feet of these teachers,' (where learners generally sat, 10:39. Acts 22:3.) 'he might be said to be "in the midst of them," as they sat on benches of a semicircular form, raised above their auditors and disciples.' Doddridge. It is indeed astonishing, that any one should conceive of the child Jesus as placing himself among the teachers; on the same seat; or of his being allowed to do it, and so to enter on disputes with them!—When, however, Joseph and Mary saw Jesus, they were exceedingly surprised; and his mother, in a way of gentle rebuke, inquired of him, "Why he had thus dealt with them;" adding "Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing," or in great anguish of mind. To this he answered by inquiring "wherefore they sought him: did they not know, that he must be engaged in his Father's business?" i. e. at those places, and in those things, which related to his worship and service. In this he had been, and must at all times be, employed; this they would have known, had they duly attended to the various prophecies, and to the words of the angel Gabriel, concerning him: and with this no regard to any earthly relation must be allowed to interfere. (Marg. Ref. y.) This expression also intimated, that he was in every sense "the Son of God." However, neither Joseph nor Mary at that time fully understood his meaning, having still many prejudices, and much darkness upon their minds, as to those subjects: yet Mary carefully remembered, and deeply meditated on, all these sayings of her Son. (Note, 15—20, v. 19.) But, though in this one instance, he showed the superior obligation of his great work, to any authority, even that of a parent; yet he went down to Nazareth, and was in every thing else subject, not only to Mary, but to Joseph also: and it is probably reported, that he earned his livelihood by working as a carpenter, in making ploughs and yokes, till his entrance on his public ministry. (Note, Mark 6:1—4.)—He still continued to increase in wisdom, as well as in stature; and was, as Man, proportionably more worthy of the divine favour, as well as more dear to all who knew him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The omniscient God foresees and permits the innumerable volitions of free agents, and overrules them for the accomplishment of his own righteous purposes: and thus he performs his prophecies and confirms his truth, even by wicked men, and by events which seem to us most casual. But who would have expected, that "the Lord of glory," whom "all the angels of God worship," when he became a Child, and was "made of a woman," would have been lodged in a stable, or laid in a manger? Yet this was but a faint shadow of "his grace, who though he were rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty, might be made rich." (Notes, John 13:1—5. 2 Cor. 8:6—9, v. 9. Phil. 2:5—8. Heb. 2:10—13.) He well knew how wealth and magnificence glitter in our eyes, and fascinate our vain minds; how unwilling we are to be poor, and to be meanly lodged, clothed, or fed; how we desire to have our children decorated and indulged; how apt the poor are to envy the rich, and to repine at their own condition; how prone the rich are to disdain the poor, and how backward to "condescend to men of low estate." He was aware what deference would be paid, even by his ministers and disciples, to the wealthy and the noble; and what an improper distinction would be made between them and the indigent, even in religious societies and places of worship. (Note, Jam. 2:1—4.) Too much of these evils are every where to be seen: and they must have been much more predominant, had our Lord appeared on earth attended with outward splendour and magnificence. But his condition, from his birth in a stable to his death upon the cross, was suited to expose the vanity of outward distinctions, and to ennoble and dignify poverty and all its mean attendants. When we by faith view the incarnate Son of God lying in a manger, we cannot but feel a check given to our vanity and ambition, our coveting and envying; our souls must in some degree grow more weaned from the world: we cannot, with this object before our eyes, "seek great things" for ourselves or our children, or disdain the poor believer; we cannot flatter the rich or honourable, or refuse respect to those who are the most apt representatives of our poor and suffering Redeemer; and we should be more effectually delivered from such errors in judgment and practice, did we more fully "ponder these things in our hearts."—But while, with admiring gratitude, we contemplate the Saviour's condescension, in thus enduring all to which sin had exposed us, from his birth to his death, let us not forget to copy the meekness and patience of his virgin-mother: she willingly endured fatigue, contempt, and neglect, and contentedly was lodged in a stable; and she met the pains of child-birth in that incommodious situation, without complaining of the unkindness of the citizens of Bethlehem.—If any persons, when performing the tender duties of the parental character, should be ready to complain, that their beloved offspring are not provided for as they could wish; let them think of Mary, wrapping her holy babe in swaddling clothes, and laying him in the manger: this will silence the rising murmur, or change it into admiring praise. And, whilst we contrast her conduct with that of those who at that time shut their doors against the most excellent and honoured persons who ever visited the city, that they might entertain the sons and daughters of pride and affluence; let us learn to "use hospitality without grudging," especially to poor believers; and instead of feasting the rich with ostentatious expense, let us entertain Christ in the person of his poor disciples. Thus we shall approve ourselves "followers of God, as dear children," and ensure a gracious recompense at the "resurrection of the just." (Note, 14:12—14. P. O. 12—24.)

V. 8—14. We should learn to judge and act as holy angels do: they did not regard the holy family the less, for being lodged in a stable: nay, the humility and abasement which veiled the Saviour's glory as he lay in the manger, made it in their eyes more admirable; and he never appeared so honourable and excellent, according to their judgment, as in that situation, except when he hung expiring upon the cross for our sins, and praying for his crucifiers. These blessed spirits were perfectly satisfied to announce his birth to poor shepherds in the field, rather than to such as inhabited palaces, or even to those who were lodged in the precincts of the temple: for humble and simple piety, and honest industry, are more approved by the inhabitants of heaven, than all the dignities and wisdom of the world. (Note, Heb. .:13,14.) The angels delight in contemplating the mysteries of redeeming love; and in celebrating the praises of God, for those displays of his glory, in which they are not personally interested: and they still, as it were, proclaim in our ears, "To you is born a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." These then ought to be glad tidings to all who hear them, and they will give great joy to all who believe them: for in them all our hopes centre, and from them all our comforts flow.—What an auspicious morning was that which brought so great a blessing to lost mankind! How joyful was that day which first conveyed the sound of the gospel to our ears! But most happy for us the hour in which we were enabled to believe in Christ for the salvation of our souls. Unless this has been vouchsafed, we can have no reason to celebrate the nativity of Jesus with rejoicings; for that event will enhance the guilt and condemnation of unbelievers: and if real Christians deem it proper to commemorate it, at a season set apart for that purpose; they will not do it with bacchanalian revels or luxurious feastings; but with more abundant thanksgivings to God, and liberality to the poor. They will join their feeble lispings to the songs of angels, and with adoring, grateful acclamations repeat, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill towards men:" they will employ their prayers, examples, and endeavours, to give glory to God, by doing what they can to make known the gospel to those who sit in darkness all over the world, by seeking the peace of his church, and by copying his good will to men; and thus they will ripen for the joys of heaven, by their worship and services here on earth.

V. 15—24. When we are favoured with peculiar discoveries of the glory of the Lord, and of his love to us, we should excite one another to a more unreserved attention to his directions; we should examine more fully those things which he has made known to us, and seek to have our faith confirmed by experience; we should endeavour to report to others, what he has taught us concerning the divine Saviour; and pondering such things in our hearts, we should return from holy ordinances to our secular employments, glorifying God for all we have heard and experienced.—While we trust in the perfect righteousness of our divine Surety, we ought to copy his example; seeking the true circumcision of the heart, the genuine purification from the pollution of sin, and the dedication of body and soul to God, which were shadowed forth in the ancient types and institutions of the Mosaic law. We ought also to present our children to the Lord who gave them to us; desiring that he would redeem them from sin and death, make them holy to himself, and number them with "the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven:" and such poor services, if they be the fruit of an humble and upright heart, will not be rejected. (Notes, Matt. 19:13—15. Mark 10:13—16.)

V. 25—40. Professing to depend on the salvation of the Lord, and to "wait for the consolation of Israel;" justice, truth, and mercy, as well as piety, should adorn our conduct, and if the Holy Spirit rest upon us, our feet will be directed to the courts and ordinances of the Lord. In this way we shall experience the fulfilment of the promises: and if we embrace, as it were, the Saviour, in the arms of faith, hope, and love, we shall meet death bereaved of his sting, and be willing to leave this world and go to heaven; provided our work be done, and God be pleased to dismiss us to his heavenly rest. (Note, Heb. 4:3—11.) Blessed be his name, that this Salvation "is prepared before the face of all people," and that this Light hath lightened our Gentile land: may we become a part of the true Israel, who glory in Christ alone! (Note, Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.)—But let us not look merely on one side of this subject. This blessed gospel eventually occasions the fall of many professed Christians, who neglect, despise, or pervert so great salvation: as well as causes the rising again of many who were sunk deep into guilt and impiety. Still Jesus, and his doctrine and people, are placed for a "sign that is every where spoken against;" still his truth and holiness are contradicted and blasphemed: still the preaching of his word is the touchstone of men's characters, and often brings to light the secret pride, enmity, and wickedness of their hearts; still they who are blessed by their relation to Jesus and union with him, must expect to witness and experience such things in this evil world, as will wound and distress their souls; and still they must prepare to endure contradiction, reproach, and contempt, because they resemble their blessed Saviour.—We should be careful how we indiscriminately condemn practices or modes of life, because many have disgraced them: for who can refuse a tribute of commendation to the pious Anna? When the relative and social duties have been attended to, or as far as consists with a due performance of them, it is very proper to spend the decline of life, especially, in retirement and devotion: and to serve God with fastings and prayers, day and night, as connected with deep humility, and a readiness to welcome Christ and his salvation, and to speak of him to all who wait for his redemption, must be allowed to be essentially different from the proud austerities and hypocritical devotions of self-righteous Pharisees, ancient and modern. But, whether zeal against the latter has not led many persons to overlook and even despise the former, instead of considering them, in similar circumstances, as models for imitation, is a question which ought seriously to be examined. They, however, who are most mortified to the world, and abstracted from it, or abundant in every good work from proper principles, will with one consent bear testimony to Christ, "as the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.)

V. 41—52. Let us not pass over unimproved the only authentic record which we have of our Redeemer's conduct in his youth. When we had read that he "waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom, and that the grace of God was with him;" (alas! most of us may say, 'How contrary to my youthful years; in which I grew in sin and folly as I grew in stature, and as the powers of my mind unfolded!') we might have expected to hear many extraordinary things concerning him: yet nothing is related of such matters as are commonly reported about promising children. We are however informed that the ordinances and temple of God were his delight; and that in Jesusalem nothing so much attracted his attention, as the instructions of the public teachers of the divine law. (Note, Matt. 23:1—4.) These things we ought to deem most worthy of our regard: in these we should find our chief satisfaction: thus young persons should employ their early days; seeking the knowledge of divine truth; attending on the ministry of the gospel; proposing such inquiries to their seniors and instructers as may tend to the increase of knowledge; and studying to be able, with pertinency and propriety, to answer such questions as may be put to them. From the earliest youth, every one should deem the service of God his great business: and the glory of his name, and the duty owing to him, must be allowed a pre-eminence, even above that of children to their parents; and must be attended to, even when it interferes with their inclination and satisfaction. In all things else the blessed Saviour has left an example to young persons, of unreserved subjection, not only to their own parents, but even to those who are by any means intrusted with a kind of parental authority; and he has also taught them patient industry and contentment in a mean condition. These, when connected with piety and humility, are proper evidences of an increase of true wisdom, and of having obtained favour with God: and they have a tendency to render the possessor dear to his fellow-creatures also; especially to those who most deserve estimation, and whose friendship is a privilege. Let us then endeavour to keep the sayings of Jesus in our hearts, and to transcribe his example in our life.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1. In the interval, between the birth of Jesus, and the entrance of John the Baptist on his public ministry, various changes had taken place in the government of Judea, and the adjacent countries. Augustus Cæsar, having admitted his nephew Tiberius to a share in the imperial authority, died about three years after: and Tiberius was at that time in the fifteenth year of his reign, from his appointment as the colleague of Augustus. Not long after the death of Herod the great, his dominions were divided into four distinct governments, under the Roman emperor. Pontius Pilate had just been appointed procurator of Judea. Herod Antipas, the son of King Herod, held as tetrarch the government of Galilee: his brother Philip, that of Iturea and Trachonitis, to the west of Herod's district; and Lysanias (who seems not to have been of Jewish extraction) held the government of Abilene, to the north of Galilee on the borders of Syria.

V. 2, 3. The ecclesiastical affairs of the Jews were at this time fallen into great disorder, and the high priesthood was disposed of at the will of the ruling powers, from secular motives, without regard to the regular succession; and frequently the high-priest was deposed, and another substituted in his place: so that in some instances it appeared more like an annual office, than one held during life. It cannot be supposed, that there were, strictly speaking, two high-priests at the same time: but in the New Testament the same word (αρχιερευς) is used for the high-priest, and the chief priests who were the heads of the twenty-four courses: being singular when the high-priest is intended, and plural when used for the chief priests. The two persons, therefore, whom the Roman governor considered as the chief of the priests, and whose names stood as such in the public registers, may be intended. From the time of the Maccabees, the high priesthood had been held by persons, who also exercised a kind of regal authority. And when the nation was subdued under the Roman governors; the "ruler of the people," (Acts 23: 5.) and the president of the sanhedrim, was the high-priest, or a chief priest. Now Annas had been high-priest, in the ordinary sense of the word, but had been deposed by the Roman governor: yet it seems, that he still continued "ruler of the people" and president of the sanhedrim; while, after several other changes, Caiaphas his son-in-law had been appointed by Pilate high-priest, to officiate at the temple. So that an irregularity had arisen out of the confusion of the times: and the ruler or prince under the Romans, though a chief priest, was a distinct person from the high-priest: Annas being the one, and Caiaphas the other. Thus St. John mentions the carrying of Christ to Annas first, as to an officer of principal authority among them, who sent him bound to Caiaphas, who "was the high-priest that year," (John 18:13,14,24. Acts 4:6.) and so continued all the time of Pilate's procuratorship. Hammond.—Some indeed suppose that Annas was high-priest, and Caiaphas acted as his deputy: but no deputy of the high-priest was allowed to officiate, except when the high-priest was sick, or by some means incapacitated, and it does not appear that Annas was either: and the above statement seems satisfactorily to solve the difficulty of two persons being considered as chief or high-priests, one as "the ruler of the people," and the other as performing the office of high-priest at the temple. Thus "the sceptre was departing from Judah," and consequently Shiloh was at hand, at the time when "the word of the Lord came to John," as to the prophets of old; (Note, Gen. 49:10.) and when by immediate inspiration he was directed to go into the country about Jordan, and "to preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins."—From these words we learn that John preached the necessity of repentance, in order to the remission of sins; and that the baptism of water was an outward sign of that inward cleansing and renewal of heart, which attend or spring from true repentance: so that if the baptized persons were really partakers of this inward humiliation and cleansing, they would certainly receive forgiveness of sins through the Saviour, who was about to appear: for they would then be prepared to welcome and participate the privileges and blessings of his spiritual redemption and kingdom. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, Matt. 3:1,2,5,6,11,12. Mark 1:4—11.)—The word, &c. (2) 'These are the very words used of the prophets of the Old Testament: (Jer. 1:2,4,11. Ez. 1:3 6:1. 7:1. 12:1. 13:1. 14:2,12.) and it is so said of the rest. Shall 7 Then said he to the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him, [p]O generation of vipers, who hath warned you [q]to flee from the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore [r]fruits [s]worthy of repentance; and begin not to say within yourselves, [t]We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able [u]of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

9 And [v]now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

10 And the people asked him, saying, [x]What shall we do then?

11 He answereth and saith unto them, [y]He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat let him do likewise.

12 Then [z]came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do?

13 And he said unto them, [a]Exact no more than that which is appointed you.

14 And [b]the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, [†]Do violence to no man, neither [c]accuse any falsely; [d]and be content with your [‡]wages.

we then think that this forerunner of the Messiah spake the words of the Lord, as did the prophets of the Old Testament; and that the prophets and apostles of the New Testament, on whom the Holy Ghost descended, to enable them to teach the mind of Christ to all future ages of the church, should not speak and write, what they delivered as the rule of faith, by like divine assistance?' Whitby.—Nothing can be determined concerning the time of our Lord's baptism, from the date of John's beginning to preach. I believe there are no data, from whence to conclude the age of John at that time. (Notes, Num. 4:3. 8:25,26. 1 Chr. 23:24—28.) Probably he preached and baptized longer, before our Lord entered on his ministry, than some harmonists have allotted him. Nothing, however, can be more frivolous, than an objection started by some against the narrative of the evangelists, because the thirtieth year of our Lord's age, (Note, 23.) being supposed coincident with the fifteenth of Tiberius's reign, according to their computation, would fix the birth of Christ subsequent to the death of king Herod. But John might come forth in the fifteenth of Tiberius; and Jesus might not be baptized till the seventeenth or eighteenth, without the least inconsistency with any thing taught or recorded in Scripture.

V. 4—6. (Marg. Ref. k—o. Notes, Is. 40:3—5. Matt. 3:4. Mark 1:1—3.) This quotation is nearly according to the Septuagint, though it does not exactly accord to it. Instead of the words, "The glory of the LORD shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together;" (Is. 40:5.) the clause from the Septuagint is here added, "All flesh shall see the salvation of God." (Note, Is. 52:9,10.)—The glory of God is specially shown in Christ, "the salvation of God;" and it shall at length be made known to all mankind.—The word in the Hebrew is JEHOVAH. "Prepare ye the way of JEHOVAH, &c."

V. 7—9. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 3:7—10.) 'What in St. Matthew (Matt. 3:7.) is said to have been spoken to the Pharisees and Sadducees, is here said to have been spokon τοις οχλοις, to the multitude coming forth to be baptized; partly, because it was spoken to the Pharisees mixed with the multitude, and in their audience; and agreed to them, not only as being generally of one of these two sects, but being also an adulterous generation, degenerated from the seed of Abraham, to be the seed of the serpent.' Whithy.—The warning here given seems to have been principally addressed to the Sadducees and Pharisees: though the people, being in general infected with the same leaven, were likewise in some measure included. (Note, Matt. 23:29—33.) —Begin not, &c. (8) 'Do not attempt to plead, as you generally do, your relation to Abraham; for it will not at all avail you.' (Notes, John 8:30—47.)

V. 10—14. While the Pharisees, Sadducees, priests, scribes, and rulers, generally neglected John's exhortations; the common people inquired of him "what they must do," in order "to bring forth fruits worthy of repentance." To this he answered in general, by inculcating a disinterested love to their neighbours. Not only ought the rich to be very liberal: but every one who possessed two coats, when one would serve his present purpose, was directed to give the other to some poor man who had none: and he that had food for the present, to impart a portion of it to him that had none, without any solicitude about the future. (Marg. Ref. y. Note, 1 John 3:16,17.) It may not be proper to interpret such general rules strictly and literally: but, however explained, unless they be supposed to mean nothing, they certainly require a far greater degree of liberality in the rich, and even in the poor, according to their present ability, towards their still more indigent neighbours, than is almost any where practised among Christians.—The whole Scripture forbids us to consider such a duty as a meritorious condition, or qualification for coming to Christ: but as none can or will accept of his salvation, or become subjects of his kingdom, without true repentance; so the evidences and effects of this repentance are here marked out: and in the performance of these duties, the humble penitent must wait for the comforts and blessings of free salvation, and not in the neglect of them, or in the practice of his former sins. (Notes, Is. 1:16—20. Acts 10:1—8, vv. 2,4.)—In like manner John answered the more particular inquiry of the publicans, or the farmers of the public taxes. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. 9:9.) He did not require them to renounce their employment; but to act in it with scrupulous integrity; not using either force or fraud to enhance their profits, by exacting more than their legal due. This implied that many of them were guilty of such exactions; but it seems also to allow that these might be entirely avoided, and that the employment was not unlawful in itself. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, 19:1—10, vv. 2,8.)—That repentance cannot be sincere, which does not induce men to make restitution of iniquitous gain, as far as they have ability and opportunity, yet John seems not in the first instance to have insisted on this, for it is a subject which often involves complicated questions; but the same principle which induces men to forego all unjust gain, will at length lead them to make restitution as far as they are able. (P. O. 19:1—10. Notes, Num. 5:7,8. Eph. 4:28.)—There were also some soldiers, who, under convictions of sin, inquired what they must do. The Jews, in those days, sometimes served in the Roman armies, and John did not direct them to quit that ensnaring situation, which probably could not have been done without extreme difficulty, and causing much displeasure to their rulers: but he ordered them to behave in a harmless and quiet manner in their station; not terrifying or injuring any one, and not bearing slanderous testimony against any person in order to obtain his property, or to flatter their superiors and court their favour; but to be content with their wages and provisions. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b, d.)—We should consider these answers, as prescribing the present duty of the inquirers, and as forming an immediate touchstone of their sincerity: for it would be most absurd to conclude, that an external performance of these duties would purchase an indulgence to continue in other sins, or profit those who neglected the salvation of Christ. But they, who yielded prompt obedience in these things, would afterwards be more fully instructed in the nature of the kingdom and salvation of Christ. (Note, Matt. 28:19,20. 1 Thes. 4:1—5.)

V. 15—17. Whilst John in this manner taught the people; his holy life and his faithful instructions, (though he wrought no miracles,) induced many to inquire whether he were not the Christ; and they were in suspense in their own minds, and disputed or reasoned with each other about this matter; (marg.) till John, who sought no glory to himself, but only to Jesus, assured them that the Messiah was at hand, and was a far more honourable and excellent Person than he.—Some expositors seem to interpret "the baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire," almost exclusively of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles, and of the miraculous powers thus communicated: but it seems rather to refer to his penetrating, purifying, and transforming influences in the hearts of true Christians, of which those miraculous operations were an earnest and emblem. V. 18. Preached, &c.] Ευηγγελιζετο, "preached the gospel." John's testimony to Jesus, as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world," as "the Son of God," as "the Bridegroom" of the church, and as "baptizing with the Holy Ghost," fully answers the import of this appropriate term. (Notes, John 1:29—34. 3:27—36.)—John was a preacher of the gospel; though many consider his ministry in another light. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 14:3—11. Mark 6:15—29.)—Herod's persecution of so eminent a servant of God, was a more direct act of hostility against God, than his worst atrocious licentiousness; and so filled up the measure of his crimes. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 13:31—33. 23:6—12.)

The emblem has before been considered.

V. 23. Jesus "began to be about thirty years of age," at his baptism; or perhaps he began his public ministry, by being baptized of John, when he was about thirty years old. Some understand the clause to mean, that he was ruled, or was in subjection to Joseph and Mary, for about thirty years.—He was however about thirty years of age when he entered on his ministry. (Note, 2,3.) This single decision of an inspired writer outweighs all the specious conjectures of learned men, concerning the duration of our Lord's ministry: and if he was crucified in the year A. D. 33, it must have lasted longer than they generally allow; for he will be thirty years old, A. D. 27. (Note, Matt. 4: beginning.) But the word about, and the decimal number, concur in warranting an opinion, that he might be rather above thirty at this time.

V. 24—38. (Marg. Ref.) There seems no reason to doubt, that the following is the genealogy of Jesus in the line of Mary: (Note, Matt. 1:2—17.) but as the names of men alone, or chiefly, stood in public registers; so the name of Joseph, not that of Mary, must have been inserted. It had been said that Jesus was "supposed" to be the Son of Joseph; which may refer to the legal constitution, as well as to the common opinion of the Jews, as he was born of Mary after she was married to Joseph. Joseph's father was called Jacob: (Matt. 1:16.) but marrying the daughter of Heli, and being perhaps adopted by him, he was called his son, and as such his name seems to have been inserted in the public registers; and so the pedigree is carried backward in the line

CHAPTER IV.

Jesus fasts forty days, being tempted by the devil, and overcomes all his temptations, 1—13. He preaches in Galilee with great renown, 14, 15. He goes to Nazareth: and while his words excite admiration, the citizens are so offended, that they seek to kill him; but he avoids them by miracle, 16—30. He casts out an unclean spirit, 31—37; heals Peter's wife's mother, 38, 39; and works many other miracles, 40, 41. He preaches through the cities of Galilee, 42—44.

AND [a]Jesus, being [b]full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, [c]and was led by the Spirit into [d]the wilderness,

2 Being [e]forty days [f]tempted of the devil. And in those days [g]he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, [h]he afterward hungered.

3 And the devil said unto him, [i]If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread.

4 And Jesus answered him, saying, [k]It is written, [l]That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.

5 And the devil, [m]taking him up into an high mountain, showed unto him all the kingdoms of the world, [n]in a moment of time.

6 And the devil said unto him, [o]All this power will I give thee, [p]and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me, [q]and to whomsoever I will I give it.

7 If thou therefore wilt [r]worship me, all shall be thine.

8 And Jesus answered and said unto him, [s]Get thee behind me, Satan; [t]for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him [u]only shalt thou serve.

9 And he [v]brought him to Jerusalem, and set him [x]on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, [y]If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down from hence:

10 For [z]it is written, [a]He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee;

11 And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

12 And Jesus answering, said unto him, It is said, [b]Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

13 And [c]when the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season.

of Nathan to David, and from him to Adam, "who was the Son of God," as created by him in his own image, though he soon lost it by sin. Some of the same names indeed occur, which are in Joseph's genealogy: but as different persons often bear the same name, it seems needless to perplex ourselves about so common a case.—Indeed Joseph could not, in the male line, be descended both from Solomon and Nathan. Yet the arguments urged to prove, that this is Joseph's genealogy, not Mary's, are formed on the supposition that the female line was excluded.—Cainan (36) is not found in the Hebrew text in any of the genealogies, but only in the Septuagint. It is probable, the evangelists transcribed the registers, as sufficiently exact for their purpose, and as more generally suited to command attention, than if they had even rendered them more accurate. The interpretation of this genealogy as that of Mary, and in the line of Nathan, is objected to, on the supposition that the Messiah was to descend from Solomon; which in this case he did not. But it is nowhere said, that he was to descend from Solomon: but merely, that he was to be the Son of David, and spring "from the root of Jesse." Solomon was an eminent type of Christ, and is spoken of as such: but it is not said to David, "In Solomon shall thy seed be called;" as to Abraham, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:12—16. Ps. 72:89:19—37. Jer. 22:28—30.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. While the people of the world are eagerly contending for transient honours, or employed in the pursuit of earthly vanities, the servants of God grow up in obscurity: but when the Lord has prepared them for usefulness, he will bring them forth and employ them.—The true doctrine of the holy Scriptures is equally calculated to encourage the humble, and to abase the proud: when faithfully and successfully dispensed, "the valleys are exalted and the hills brought low," and every obstacle is removed to make way for Christ to reveal his salvation, and set up his kingdom in the hearts of sinners. But many attend the preaching of the gospel, and come to sacred ordinances, who are no better than "a generation of vipers;" they should therefore be dealt with very plainly, nay, sometimes roughly; that they may be "warned to flee from the wrath to come," and made sensible that it is vain to rely on forms, notions, or external privileges, without "repentance and fruits meet for repentance." Some indeed seem to think, that God would have no church on earth, if their sect or company were cast off: but he would sooner form children to Abraham from the very stones of the street, than accept or save hypocrites, and wicked professors of the gospel. These are trees, at whose root the axe is laid, to cut them speedily down that they may be "cast into the fire;" because amidst all their advantages they bring forth no good fruit: yea, they are light worthless chaff, to be driven, as with a whirlwind, into the unquenchable fire of hell. Men should therefore not only ask, "What must we do to be saved?" but also inquire particularly concerning the proper evidences and effects of saving faith and true repentance; the duties of their stations, and the way in which they must wait for the consolations of the gospel: and ministers should enter into the detail, and be exact and particular in answering these inquiries. In general our repentance, faith, and love of God our Saviour, must be evinced by love to our neighbours and brethren: and surely our clearer discoveries of the unspeakable mercy of the Lord Jesus to our sinful souls, ought not to render us more niggardly in relieving the distresses of our fellow-sinners: yet the rule laid down by this "man of God" would be deemed extremely rigorous, if we now should attempt to insist upon its being strictly observed. Thus much, however, we must say: "He who soweth liberally, shall reap also liberally;" and that "God loveth a cheerful giver." (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:1—15.)—It is not generally advisable for men to quit their stations in the community, provided they are not directly criminal: for though they be attended with peculiar temptations; yet they may also afford them peculiar advantages for showing the excellency of the gospel, and the power of divine grace, by a blameless deportment in them; and there are many employments, that could have no existence, were men not wicked, which are nevertheless needful in the present state of the world, and a person may conscientiously serve God in them. Men should first be cautioned against the peculiar temptations of their respective employments; and warned to avoid the sins, and to give up the iniquitous gains, which generally attend them: (Note, Ex. 22:25—27.) and when they are prevailed upon to make these sacrifices for conscience' sake, their hearts are prepared to welcome the salvation of Christ, and to receive instructions in every thing belonging to the doctrine, experience, and practice of Christianity: and eminent holiness, so far from rendering a man proud, will proportionably abase him in his own esteem, render him regardless of his own glory, and make Christ more precious to his heart, and glorious in his eyes.

V. 19—38. The faithful servants of God will be sure to make themselves enemies, among the proud and licentious; and contempt, reproach, and persecution are the general recompense of their honest reproofs. Yet those who thus injure them add a greater evil to all their other sins, and one expressive of more determined enmity to God and holiness, than any of the rest.—While, after the example of our righteous Surety, we are pouring out our hearts in prayer, and honouring the ordinances of God, we may expect to have the heavens, as it were, opened to pour down blessings on our heads. Indeed all good things may be said to be comprised in the Spirit of adoption communicated to us, to glorify the Saviour, and to be the pledge and earnest of eternal felicity. (Notes, 11:5—13, v. 13. Matt. 7:7—11, v. 11.) If our souls be renewed, by his sacred influences, to a conformity with Christ, in purity, meekness, and love; we shall thus be evinced to be the children of our Father, with whom for his sake he will be well pleased, though in ourselves we are most unworthy: and thus also we shall be qualified for every service to which we are called. These are privileges worthy of our estimation.—"All flesh," as descended from the first Adam, is indeed "as grass," and "withers as the flower of the field;" but he who partakes of "the Spirit of life" from the second Adam, has that eternal happiness "which by the gospel is preached to us." (Note, 1 Cor. 15:45—49.)

16 ¶ And he came [h]to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, [i]as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day, [k]and stood up for to read.

17 And there was delivered unto him [l]the book of the prophet Esaias: and when he had opened the book, he found [m]the place where it was written,

18 The [n]Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath [o]anointed me [p]to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me [q]to heal the broken-hearted, [r]to preach deliverance to the captives, [s]and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are [t]bruised,

20 And he closed the book, [x]and he gave it again to the minister, [y]and sat down. [z]And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.

21 And he began to say unto them, [a]This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.

22 And all bare him witness, and wondered at [b]the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, [c]Is not this Joseph's son?

23 And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, [d]Physician, heal thyself: [e]whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum [f]do also here in [g]thy country.

24 And he said, Verily I say unto you, [h]No prophet is accepted in his own country.

V. 16—19. When our Lord had made a circuit through the other parts of Galilee, he came at length to Nazareth, where he had spent his former life: 'that he by his example might teach us, saith Theophylact, first to teach and do good to those of our own family and abode.' Whitby.—On the sabbath-day, according to his constant custom in every place, he resorted to the Synagogue; that he might join in the public worship there performed, and embrace the opportunity of instructing the people: (Marg. Ref. h, i.) and, either because he had been used to join in their stated worship, and perhaps sometimes to officiate as a reader; or because of the reputation which he had acquired by his miracles and doctrine in other places; they gave him a roll containing the prophecy of Isaiah, that he might read the Scriptures to them, which was always a part of their stated service. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) When therefore he had unrolled the parchment, he read a portion, which has already been considered. (Note, Is. 61:1—3.) Perhaps it was a part of one of the lessons appointed for the day. —"The day of vengeance of our God," (which the prophet connected with "the acceptable year of the LORD,") seems not to have been insisted on by Jesus; that the Nazarites might have the less pretence for rejecting him, when his whole discourse breathed nothing but mercy and compassion.—(Marg. Ref. n—u.)—The passage, as here quoted, does not exactly accord either to the Hebrew or to the Septuagint: yet it does not vary materially from either.—The "recovering of sight to the blind" is here added, not being either in the Septuagint, or our Hebrew Bibles: and it seems an allusion to the wretched state of those prisoners, whose eyes had been put out, when they were thrown into the dungeon, and loaded with fetters which "bruised" their limbs. No other deliverer except the Lord Jesus, could restore to a redeemed captive the sight of which he had been deprived.

V. 20—22. Having chosen the foregoing words as the subject of his discourse, Jesus gave the book into the hands of the minister, (or stated servant of the synagogue, who took care of those matters,) and sat down, as teachers used then to do. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) 'He stood up to read (20) and closing the book, he sat down. Here Christ conforms to the ceremonies of the Jewish doctors, who in honour of the law and prophets, stood up when they read them. ... And he sits down to teach.' Whitby. The report of his miracles and doctrine, when compared with this remarkable prophecy, caused the people to fix their eyes upon him, with the greatest expectation and attention. Indeed he began by explicitly declaring, that the words read to them had been that "day fulfilled in their ears;" which implied that he was the promised Messiah of whom the prophet spake: and doubtless he explained the words, as referring to the spiritual redemption which he came to effect in behalf of enslaved sinners, and earnestly exhorted and persuaded his hearers to seek these important blessings. In short, he spake with such energy, wisdom, and affection, that, notwithstanding their strong prejudices, they "bare witness to him," that he had discoursed in an excellent manner, and exceedingly admired the "words of grace," and tender compassion for the miseries of sinful men, which he had delivered with much propriety and authority.—Yet the recollection of his mean birth, and of the disadvantages of his education and previous manner of life, proved an insuperable stumbling-block: and, instead of inferring, that he had his wisdom and utterance immediately from heaven, they rejected his claim to be the Messiah, and seem even to have doubted of the reality of the miracles, which it was reported that he wrought. (Notes, Matt. 11:2—6. 13:54—58. Mark 6:1—6.)—'It does not appear to me likely, that persons of every kind were rashly admitted to speak publicly in the synagogues; but that this was the ordinary office of the scribes and lawyers; the Levites for this purpose having been dispersed into many places. ... But, moreover, that certain persons, as invited by the rulers of the synagogue, sometimes officiated, besides this settled order, appears from Acts 13:15. ... The majesty and the miracles of Christ every where procured him a hearing.' Beza.

'which, it is probable, may refer to the agreeable manner of Christ's discourse, as well as to the matter of it.' Doddridge. That our Lord's elocution was peculiarly becoming, majestic, solemn, impressive, and persuasive, can scarcely be doubted. In every sense, "he spake as never man spake:" and this would excite the additional astonishment of those, who knew the meanness of his birth and education. It may, however, be questioned, whether χαρις ever has this meaning in the N. T.

V 23—32. The thoughts of the Nazarenes were fully 26 But unto none of them was Elias sent, [k]save [l]unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow.

27 And many lepers were in Israel in the time of [l]Eliseus the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, [m]saving [n]Naaman the Syrian.

28 And all they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, [o]were filled with wrath, 29 And rose up, [p]and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the [q]brow of the hill, whereon their city was built, [q]that they might cast him down headlong.

30 But he, [r]passing through the midst of them, went his way, 31 And [s]came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, [t]and taught them on the sabbath-days.

[Practical Observations.]

32 And [u]they were astonished at his doctrine; for his word was with power.

33 ¶ And [x]in the synagogue there was a man, which had a spirit of an unclean devil, and cried out with a loud voice, 34 Saying, [y]Let us alone: [z]what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? [a]art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art; [a]the Holy One of God.

35 And [b]Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had [c]thrown him in the midst, he came out of him, and hurt him not.

36 And [d]they were all amazed, and spake among themselves, saying, [e]What a word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out!

37 And [f]the fame of him went out into every place of the country round about.

38 ¶And [g]he arose out of the synagogue, and entered into Simon's house: and Simon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; [h]and they besought him for her.

39 And he stood over her, [i]and rebuked the fever; and it left her. And immediately she arose, [k]and ministered unto them.

40 ¶ Now [l]when the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him; [m]and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them.

41 And devils also came out of many, [n]crying out, and saying, [o]Thou art Christ, the Son of God. And he, rebuking them, suffered them not to [p]speak: for they knew that he was Christ.

42 And [q]when it was day he departed and went into a desert place; [q]and the people sought him, and came unto him, [r]and stayed him, that he should not depart from them.

43 And he said unto them, [s]I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for [t]therefore am I sent.

44 And [u]he preached in the synagogues of Galilee.

known to our Lord; and he intimated, that he was aware they were disposed to use the common proverb, "Physician, heal thyself," with relation to him: intimating, that if indeed he were able to perform miraculous cures, he ought to have begun with healing the diseases of his old neighbours; or at least that he ought now to do such miracles among them, as it was reported he had wrought at Capernaum, if he expected any regard from them. Thus they were disposed to dictate to him, or to cavil at his ministry, because he did not comply with their unreasonable demands, or pay court to them: nay, they spake as if they had a just claim to his miraculous cures in preference to others. (Marg. Ref. d—g.) He therefore now first applied to them that proverb, which has already been considered: (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Matt. 13:54—58. John 4:43—45.) for having known him in a situation, externally inferior to that of many present, they could not endure to be warned and instructed by him, or admit of his superiority over them. But he further observed, that he had a right to dispense his favours as he saw good; and that in working miracles at other places rather than at Nazareth, he did the same as the ancient prophets had done. For in the terrible famine, which took place in the days of Elijah, (Notes, 1 Kings 17:) that prophet was not sent to relieve any of the poor destitute widows of Israel, but to a widow of Gentile extraction alone: and, in like manner, Elisha cleansed none of the lepers of Israel; but exerted his miraculous power on Naaman, a Syrian. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:) So that, if he had not only given Capernaum the preference to Nazareth, but had even neglected the Jews, and conferred his favours on the Gentiles, they could not have objected to his conduct, without condemning these two prophets. But, while their prejudices and unbelief were the real reasons, why they were not favoured equally with other cities; this declaration of our Lord, that he had a right to work his miracles where he pleased, exceedingly enraged them, as if it had been an inexcusable injustice! (Marg. Ref. i—o.) They therefore forgot the holiness of the day, and the religious purposes for which they were assembled; and, rising up with one consent, they thrust him out of the synagogue, and even out of the city; hurrying him away to the brink of a precipice, that they might cast him down and dash him to pieces. But he miraculously eluded their attempt, and, passing unobserved through the midst of them, went to Capernaum, where he proceeded to teach the people with surprising authority and energy. (Marg. Ref. p—u. Notes, Matt. 7:28,29. John 8:54—59, v. 59 10:32—39, v. 39.)—'When they heard Christ declaring them unworthy of the benefit of those miracles which he had done at Capernaum, and . . . plainly intimating, that this gospel should chiefly be received among the Gentiles, they, in a furious zeal, seek to destroy him.' Whitby. The inhabitants, however, of the cities, in which our Lord's miracles were principally wrought, were expressly declared by him to be unworthy of them: (10:13—15. Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) yet their prejudices were not so strong as those of the Nazarenes, nor were they disposed to persecute him; and there were more believers among them, than at Nazareth. But, in fact, the indignation shown on this occasion, was excited by the doctrine of the divine sovereignty. "May I not do what I will with my own?" May I not confer unmerited favours on whom I will, without doing injustice to those who do not share them? The doctrine, which is supported against all objections by these questions, offended the men of Nazareth; as it ever did, and ever will, offend those, who "have not submitted to the righteousness of God." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. When we return from sacred ordinances, replete with those spiritual affections which are excited by the Holy Spirit, it is good to retire for prayer and meditation: and should Satan even take that opportunity of harassing us, we shall possess many advantages for repelling his assaults.—Fervent devotion, or sharp conflicts, may render us for a time regardless of the concerns of our animal life, and this may conduce to our earnestness and success: but the cravings of nature will again return; and then the devil will tempt us to impatience, to irregular methods of obtaining a supply, or to excessive indulgence: we ought, therefore, to be especially upon our guard, after remarkable seasons of abstraction and communion with God. The enemy knows how to make his advantage of all the peculiarities of our situation; and it is our wisdom and duty to study them ourselves, that we may

CHAPTER V.

Jesus teaches the people from Simon's ship, 1—3; who, by his direction and power, takes a large draught of fishes, 4—7. Simon, James, and John, follow him, 8—11. He cleanses a leper, 12—15; withdraws for prayer, 16; heals a paralytic, and silences the objections of the scribes and Pharisees against his forgiving sins, 17—26: calls Levi, and justifies his own eating with publicans and sinners, 27—32; and vindicates his disciples, for not fasting, at present, after the manner of the Pharisees and John's disciples, 33—39

AND it came to pass, that, [a]as the people pressed upon him to hear the word of God, he stood by [b]the lake of Gennesaret,

2 And saw two ships standing by the lake: but the fishermen were gone out of them, and were [c]washing their nets.

3 And he entered into one of the ships, [d]which was Simon's, and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land. And [e]he sat down, and taught the people out of the ship.

4 Now when he had left speaking, he said unto Simon, [f]Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught.

5 And Simon answering said unto him, Master, [g]we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: [h]nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net.

6 And when they had this done, [i]they enclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake.

7 And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, [k]that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink.

8 When Simon Peter saw it, [l]he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, [m]Depart from me, for [n]I am a sinful man, O Lord.

9 For [o]he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken:

10 And so was also [p]James and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were [q]partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; [r]from henceforth thou shalt catch men.

11 And when they had brought their ships to land, [s]they forsook all, and followed him.

be prepared for the assault, and have our answer ready to every suggestion.—To whatever sin we are tempted, the Scripture, well understood, supplies us with spiritual armour of proof, with which to battle the tempter. Let us remember in all our straits, "that man doth not live by bread only, but by the word of God also;" that all Satan's promises and pretences are illusion and deceit; and that, as far as he is permitted to have any influence, in disposing of the "kingdoms of the world and the glory of them," he uses them merely as baits, by which to ensnare ambitious and carnal men to their destruction. We should therefore reject every opportunity of sinful gain or advancement, with decision and abhorrence, as a price offered for our souls; (P. O. Matt. 16:21—28.) and seek our riches, honours, and happiness, in the worship and service of God only. Thus, as his beloved children, angels will have it in charge "to keep us in all our ways," and we shall be preserved from turning aside, through presumptuously or ostentatiously "tempting the Lord our God."—As seasons of peculiar consolation are commonly transient, so are those of distressing temptation, especially when the enemy is vigorously resisted. But though he "depart for a season," we shall never be out of his reach, till we are removed from this evil world. Yet when, in the strength and after the example of our Redeemer, we have obtained a decisive victory, we may hope for a respite, and an opportunity of applying ourselves, with composure and diligence, to our proper work. (P. O. Matt. 4:1—11.)

V. 16—31. When we meet with acceptance for a time, in our endeavours to do good; we should expect some change or alloy. Indeed fame and honour do not belong to us, but to the Lord; nor can we reasonably hope to escape that reproach and contempt, which our Redeemer continually experienced: yet this ought not to damp our ardour, or dismay us from constancy in our attempts to be useful. It should be our custom, as it was our Saviour's, to resort on "the Lord's day" at least, to the assemblies of his people, to join in his worship and attend to his truth: and whether we read, hear, or preach the word of God, we should inquire diligently into its meaning, and then apply it to our own case, or to that of others. "The Spirit of the Lord," who anointed the Saviour for his work, and who has revealed him in the Scriptures, must also discover him to our hearts, in all his gracious characters and offices: we ought, therefore, to seek this blessing, by fervent prayer, in behalf of ourselves and others, especially when attending on "the means of grace," or when about to use them. Under this blessed influence we shall perceive, that the message of the gospel is indeed "glad tidings to the poor" and humble: the divine Redeemer came on purpose to "bind up the broken in heart," and to give peace to the wounded conscience; to rescue the wretched captives of Satan; to bring them forth into the blessed light of divine truth; and to open their blinded eyes, that they may behold and rejoice in the light, and be delivered from all the galling chains of their own destructive lusts; and thus to admit them "to the glorious liberty of the children of God." Let sinners then attend to the Saviour's invitation, in "the acceptable year of the Lord," when liberty is thus proclaimed to "those that are bruised:" let them seek to him for this blessed deliverance, that this Scripture may not only be fulfilled in their ears, but in their hearts and experience; while victory, peace, consolation, and the fruits of righteousness, are the results of their faith in the incarnate Son of God.—But many will attend to the gospel, and express their approbation of the things which are spoken: yea, many will give the Lord himself good words, who will not give him their hearts. Some prejudice interferes, to furnish an objection against the humbling doctrine of the cross: and, while the word itself excites their proud and carnal enmity; men lay the blame on something in the conduct or manner of the speaker, that they may not be self-condemned in neglecting his message.—Many seem to think themselves entitled almost exclusively to the favour of God; yet they will not seek it in his appointed way: when, therefore, others enjoy the privileges which they have forfeited, they are greatly offended. In vain do we show, that God has asserted his undoubted right to "do what he will with his own;" that he has frequently passed by formalists, to save pagans and profligates; and that he always dispenses his favours in that manner, which tends most to display his own glory, and especially the riches of his unmerited grace and mercy. Instead of being silenced, they are the more exasperated by such representations; and their enmity to God often shows itself in revilings, outrages, and persecutions, against his servants. But he, who avoided the assaults of his enraged enemies, till his appointed hour arrived, will uphold and protect all his ministers, till they have "finished their testimony."

V. 32—44. If the ministers of Christ be persecuted from one place and driven to another, let them still boldly proceed in declaring to "all men every where" the way of salvation. The word which they speak, being attended with the power of their Lord, will be made effectual to convince, alarm, and convert some of their hearers. No case can be desperate if Jesus see good to work; even those in their assemblies, who are most evidently possessed of "unclean spirits," may be delivered from them, and made illustrious monuments of his grace and power: and though the devil may create great distress, to such as Christ is rescuing from his dominion, he cannot do them any real harm. We ought therefore to spread abroad the fame of the Saviour in every place; to beseech him for those who are diseased in body or mind; and to use our influence in bringing sinners to him, that his powerful hands may be laid upon them for their healing. Thus relying on his power, truth, and love, for ourselves, and those who are more immediately connected with us, we should seek to promote the preaching of his "gospel in other cities also," and in other regions, even to the ends of the earth. For though his personal ministry was confined to one place at a time, yet he may continue with us, by his word and Spirit, and extend the same blessings to other nations also; till throughout all the earth, those who now are the worshippers and servants of Satan, shall acknowledge him as "the Christ the Son of God," and find "redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of their sins, according to the riches of his grace, wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence." (Note, Eph. 1:3—8, vv. 6—8.)

NOTES.—Chap. V. V. 1—11. (Notes, Matt. 4:18—22. 13:1,2. Mark 1:16—22.) This is generally supposed to be a more particular account of the manner in which Andrew and Peter, James and John, were called to be the constant followers of Christ, in order to their appointment to the apostolic office. Andrew indeed is not mentioned; but it is probable that he was present. The exact order of the history is not, on that supposition, observed.—Some of the company might be employed in "mending their nets" after washing; and others in "washing their nets," by casting them from the shore into the lake. All of them had become acquainted with Jesus some time before; were called his disciples, and even baptized those who became his followers; and probably had attended him to Jerusalem, and returned with him through Samaria into Galilee: (Notes, John 1:35—42. 2:1—5. 3:22—24. 4:1—9.) yet they seem to have followed their ordinary employments, from time to time, till on this occasion they became his constant attendants, which was after John the 12 ¶ And it came to pass, when he was in a certain city, behold, [a] a man, [b]full of leprosy; who, seeing Jesus, [x]fell on his face, and [y]besought him, saying, Lord, [z]if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

13 And he put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, [a]I will; be thou clean. And [b]immediately the leprosy departed from him.

14 And [c]he charged him to tell no man: but go, [d]and show thyself to the priest, [e]and offer for thy cleansing according as Moses commanded, [f]for a testimony unto them.

15 But [g]so much the more [h]went there a fame abroad of him: [i]and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities. [Practical Observations.]

16 And [k]he withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed.

17 ¶ And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, [l]that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, [m]and Jerusalem; and [n]the power of the Lord was present to heal them.

18 And, behold, [o]men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palsy; and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him.

19 And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in, because of the multitude, [p]they went upon the [q]house-top, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch, into the midst before Jesus.

20 And when he [r]saw their faith, he said unto him, [s]Man, thy sins are forgiven thee.

21 And [t]the scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this which speaketh [u]blasphemies? [x]Who can forgive sins but God alone?

22 But when Jesus [y]perceived their thoughts, he answering said unto them, [z]What reason ye in your hearts?

23 Whether [a]is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk?

24 But that ye may know [b]that the Son of man hath [c]power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto the [d]sick of the palsy,) [d]I say unto thee, Arise, [e]and take up thy couch, and go unto thine house.

25 And [f]immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, [g]glorifying God.

26 And they were all amazed, [h]and they glorified God, [i]and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day.

27 ¶ And after these things he went forth, [k]and saw a publican, named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he said unto him, [l]Follow me.

28 And he [m]left all, rose up, and followed him.

29 And Levi [n]made him a great feast in his own house; [o]and there was a great company of publicans, and of others, that sat down with them.

30 But [p]their scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners?

31 And Jesus answering, said unto them, [q]They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.

32 I [r]came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. [Practical Observations.]

Baptist had been "cast into prison." (Note, Matt. 4:12—17, v. 12.)—Jesus had hitherto, generally, preached in the synagogues; but now such numbers thronged around him, that those places of worship could no longer contain them. Being, therefore, on the bank of the lake of Gennesaret, or the sea of Tiberias, attended by a vast concourse of people, who pressed on him to hear "the word of God;" (Marg. Ref. a, b.) he saw two small fishing vessels near the shore, but the fishermen had just left them: accordingly he entered that vessel which belonged to Peter, and desiring him to thrust it a little from the land, he sat down, and thence instructed the people. (Marg Ref. c—e. Note, Matt. 13:1,2.) Having finished his instructions, he directed Peter to push out his boat into the deep water of the lake, and there to let down his nets for a draught of fishes. To this Peter answered, that having toiled through the whole night, the proper time for fishing, they had taken nothing: at his word, however, they would make another attempt; though there was no human probability of success. But, beyond expectation, they enclosed immediately so large a number of fishes, that the net brake in some places with the weight of them: yet by the assistance of their partners in the other ship, they secured them all; and with them both their boats were filled so much, that they were ready to sink. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, John 21:1—14.) This display of the power and knowledge of Jesus so astonished Peter, that he was overpowered with awe and consternation: and being conscious of his own sinfulness, as well as impressed with a sense of Christ's holiness and majesty; he very humbly, but ignorantly, desired him "to depart from him," being afraid of some fatal consequence from his presence with so great a sinner. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Job 42:1—6, v. 6. Is. 6:5—8. Matt. 8:5—9.) Indeed he seems to have been so astonished, that he scarcely knew what he said: though he spake according to the notions which have generally been entertained of sinful man's danger, from the power and presence of a holy God, or of those whom he especially approves and favours. (8:37. Notes, Deut 5:22—29. Judg. 13:18—23. 1 Sam. 6:19—21. 2 Sam. 6:8, 9. 1 Kings 17:18.)—The miracle itself was emblematic of many things relative to the preaching of the gospel, and especially of Peter's great success on the day of Pentecost. (Note, Acts 2:41.)—When Christ had encouraged him and his companions, and assured them that he purposed to employ them in bringing sinners by his gospel to the obedience of faith, they did not hesitate to leave all and follow him. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 19:27,28.)

V. 33—38. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 9:14—17. Mark 2:18—22.—No man, &c. (36—38.) Perhaps the impropriety of attempting a coalition between the religion of the Pharisees, and even that of John's disciples, when they did not become the disciples of Jesus, may be meant. True religion has been for substance the same, since the revelation of a Saviour to fallen man. Even the ritual law, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, were intended to answer special purposes only for a season; Notes, Rom. 5:20:21. Gal. 3:19—22.) and the traditions of the elders, with the ceremonies of the law, and many uncommanded plausible austerities, formed the religion of the strictest sect of the Jews, in our Lord's days, to which many of John's disciples, (as distinct from Christ's,) seem in great measure to have conformed. But Jesus came, to introduce another and better dispensation, than even that of Moses, which was "waxing old and ready to vanish away;" (Notes, Heb. 8:8—13, v. 13.) as well as to vindicate the moral law, from the corrupt glosses and traditions of the Pharisees. He would not, therefore, allow his disciples to attempt a coalition between his religion, and that of the Pharisees. Fasting, as far as obligatory and useful, would form a part of the new dispensation, and not be disgraced by the superstition, hypocrisy, and spiritual pride which then attended it. But, as things were at that time, it would be as absurd to retain any part of the old system, and to graft Christianity upon it, as to put new undressed cloth on an old worn-out garment; or new fermenting wine, into old leather bottles. Thus the Jews, "going about to establish their own righteousness," and to shore up the old building by props and buttresses, refused to build on the Foundation which God himself had laid. (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.) This attempt at a coalition between the old and new dispensations, or rather between the religion of the Pharisees and that of Jesus, was the grand fault of the Judaizing teachers of Christianity, against whom St. Paul so zealously contended, especially in his epistle to the Galatians. They wanted to mend the Pharisaical religion, which was as an old worn-out garment, with the gospel; and to put the new wine of the gospel into the "old bottles," of the antiquated ceremonies of the Mosaic law, and the traditions of the elders.—This interpretation has never before been proposed, as far as I know, and I suggest it with diffidence; having never been satisfied with the interpretation generally given.

V. 39. As old wine is more valued, and deemed more wholesome and pleasant, than new, which is still in a state of fermentation; and as those who have been used to the former cannot readily be brought to relish the latter, but will still prefer the old wine; so the substantials of religion, which have been the same from the first revelation of mercy to fallen man, are far more valuable than the austerities, traditions, or peculiarities, of any party, or even than the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic law; and they, who have been habitually conversant with the former, will not easily be brought to pay great regard to the latter; but will deem repentance, faith, and holiness far preferable to them all. The Christian dispensation was new, compared with the Mosaic covenant; yet the religion contained in it is as old wine; it is that of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, &c. with only circumstantial variations. (Notes, Heb. 11:) —The verse, however, is generally explained to mean, that men cannot at once change their modes and habits of life, but must gradually be inured to those kinds and degrees of self-denial, which are not immediately necessary; as persons that have been used to old wine must be gradually brought to relish the new: and therefore Jesus did not think proper to impose such austerities on his disciples at once, but gradually to train them up to self-denial, hardship, and suffering.—Better.] Χρηστοτερος. 6:35. Rom. 2:4. Eph. 4:32.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. When multitudes "press to hear the word of God," it becomes expedient to exceed ordinary measures of diligence, in teaching them. On these rare and important occasions, every day is seasonable, and every place proper, for preaching the gospel; and the common maxims, by which such matters are regulated at other times, are superseded by far more weighty considerations.—Whatever is employed in the service of Christ, becomes holy by its relation to him; thus our houses, possessions, employments, and even refreshments, may be sanctified to us, by being rendered subservient to his glory. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:29—33, v. 31. Col. 3:16,17.)—We are often called upon to renounce temporal advantages for his sake; but we are seldom, even in these things, eventually losers by him. Obedience to his word, and dependence on his power and blessing, will in every respect ensure all desirable success; but especially in the great concerns of religion. The minister, who has toiled long, under great discouragement, and with no apparent success, must not give up his hope or cease from his labour; but at the word of his Lord, he must, again and again, "let down the net." Such delays sometimes lead to more signal success, by increasing humility, simplicity, and fervency of spirit in prayer: and thus the unsuccessful endeavours of many years may be amply recompensed by the blessing of God even on a single sermon! It would indeed be more encouraging to see some fruit of our labours, from time to time; and when this is not witnessed, it may well cause us to inquire, whether there be nothing in our spirit, conduct, or doctrine, which prevents usefulness: and whether we use all proper means of attaining it, and use them in simple dependence on the divine blessing for success: yet the effect may at length be equally great, when we long labour, diligently and patiently, as it were in the dark. Let then the "fishers of men" persevere in their work, without yielding to discouragement, or growing remiss in it: let them seek the salvation of souls alone, and not court applause; or fish for preferments, honours, and secular advantages: let them stand prepared to relinquish every worldly object at the call of Christ, that they may follow him more closely, and give themselves up wholly to their ministry: let them be helpers of each other in the work, as partners, and not rivals; and let them not fear but "from henceforth they shall catch men."—The more fully the Lord displays his excellent glory and majesty to us, the viler shall we appear in our own eyes: yet this should not induce us to say, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord;" but rather to entreat him to come and "dwell in our hearts by faith," that he may transform and cleanse them. As we are all full of the leprosy of sin, so when we hear of Jesus, we should humbly and earnestly beseech him, saying, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean:" nor need we fear a repulse, as this work is his delight and glory. Thus being saved from the guilt and power of our sins, we may diffuse abroad his fame, and be in some measure instrumental in bringing others to hear him, and to be healed of their infirmities.

V. 16—32. In tracing the example of our divine Saviour, we find that he interchanged public services and retired devotion; and that the sole business of his life was to glorify God by doing good to men, and to commune with his Father. Thus our several duties should in succession occupy our time; and piety and charity should be connected in our habitual and persevering conduct. A life thus spent will best manifest our faith in Christ, and evince that he has both pardoned our sins and healed our souls. When professors of the doctrines of grace thus copy their Lord's example, they will effectually confute the malicious cavils and perverse reasonings of opposing scribes and Pharisees: and, being enabled by divine grace to delight in the holy service of God, which no man by nature can do; they will not only glorify him themselves, but excite others to do the same. Indeed when "the power of the Lord is present to heal" men's souls; when the avaricious are induced to forego their lucrative employments, because unlawful; and profligate persons are taught to live sober, righteous, and godly lives, by hearing the despised gospel of Christ; mere spectators must sometimes be astonished, and allow that they have witnessed "strange things," which they did not expect, and cannot account for.—As Jesus "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," we too should be ready to go among them, as far as we have a prospect of doing them good; and especially to direct them to the only Physician of distempered souls: and if we well know our own sinfulness, and the power and grace of the divine Redeemer, we shall not disdain or despair of any.

V. 33—39. Let all, who would prosper in the divine life, attend chiefly to the grand essentials of religion: for when

CHAPTER VI.

Jesus vindicates his disciples from the charge of breaking the sabbath, 1—5. He shows it lawful to do good on the sabbath; and restores a withered hand, 6—10. His enemies are filled with madness, 11. He spends the night in prayer, 12; appoints the twelve apostles, 13—16; heals divers diseased persons, 17—19; pronounces blessings and woes, 20—26; and teaches love to enemies, meekness, liberality, mercy, and candour, 27—38. He shows, by parables, that knowledge is indispensably needful in teachers, and holiness in reformers, 39—42. The tree is known by his fruit, 43—45. The parable of the wise and the foolish builders, 46—49.

AND it came to pass on [a]the second sabbath after the first, [b]that he went through the corn-fields; [c]and his disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands.

2 And certain of the Pharisees said unto them, [d]Why do ye that which is [e]not lawful to do on the sabbath-days?

3 And Jesus answering them said, [f]Have ye not read so much as this, [g]what David did, when himself was an hungered, and they which were with him;

4 How he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the show-bread, and gave also to them were with him; [h]which it is not lawful to eat but for the priests alone?

5 And he said unto them, [i]That the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.

6 ¶ And [k]it came to pass also on another sabbath, that [l]he entered into the synagogue and taught: [m]and there was a man whose right hand was withered.

7 And the scribes and Pharisees [n]watched him, whether he would heal on the sabbath-day; [o]that they might find an accusation against him.

8 But [p]he knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, [q]Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose, and stood forth.

9 Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing; [r]Is it lawful on the sabbath-days to do good, or to do evil; [s]to save life, or to destroy it?

10 And, [t]looking round about upon them all, he said unto the man, [u]Stretch forth thy hand. And he did so: and his hand was restored whole as the other.

11 And [x]they were filled with madness; [y]and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus.

12 ¶ And it came to pass in those days, [z]that he went out into a mountain to pray, and [a]continued all night in prayer to God.

13 And [b]when it was day, he called unto him his disciples: and of them he chose [c]twelve, whom also he named [d]apostles:

14 [e]Simon (whom he also named Peter) and [f]Andrew his brother, [g]James and John, [h]Philip and Bartholomew,

15 [i]Matthew and [k]Thomas, [l]James the son [m]of Alphæus, and [n]Simon called Zelotes, 16 And [o]Judas the brother of James, [p]and Judas Iscariot, which also was the traitor.

17 ¶ And he came down with them, and stood in the plain, and the company of his disciples, [q]and a great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jerusalem, and from [r]the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon, [s]which came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases;

18 And they that were [t]vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed.

externals and circumstantials are magnified above their real importance, censoriousness, bigotry, and divisions are the invariable consequences.—Because humble Christians practise their self-denial, and perform their devotions, in secret, and without ostentation, Pharisees may sometimes be ready to conclude that they neither fast nor pray at all. But every part of our duty has its proper season and proportion, as stated in the Scriptures; and it should have the same in the conduct of our lives: the gracious presence of our Beloved makes a feast to our souls, so long as it is continued to us; but when our sins provoke his departure or his frown, we are called to mourn and fast as well as pray. The Lord, however, trains up his people gradually for the trials and hardships allotted them; and, in perfect wisdom and tenderness, he proportions their services to their strength: we should therefore copy his example, in dealing with the weak in faith, the young convert, or the tempted discouraged believer.—Those who have been used to drink the "old wine" of divine consolations, and of a close walk with God, have not only lost their relish for earthly joys; but they will not easily be brought to attend to those novel inventions and human additions to religion, which are most ostentatious and showy, but far less valuable and satisfactory, than a life of humble faith, and devoted obedience to the commandments of our Lord and Saviour.

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1. Second Sabbath, &c.] Some render the original words, "the second prime sabbath;" supposing that the day of Pentecost was meant, and that it fell on the sabbath-day. The three great feasts were, in many respects, observed as sabbaths; (Marg. Ref. a.) for the first day of unleavened bread began in the evening, after the close of the fourteenth day of the first month, about the time when the passover was eaten. (Notes, Ex. 12:15—20.) But when either the first day of unleavened bread, or the day of Pentecost, or the first day of the feast of Tabernacles, fell on a sabbath, it was reckoned peculiarly sacred. When the first day of unleavened bread fell thus, it was called 'The first prime sabbath:' the Pentecost falling thus, was called 'the second prime sabbath:' and the first day of the feast of tabernacles, in this case, was called 'the third prime sabbath.' This is the opinion of Grotius, Hammond, and many learned expositors.—But others render the words, "The first sabbath, after the second day of unleavened bread." From this day, seven weeks were numbered, and then the Pentecost, or the feast of weeks, was observed. 'The first sabbath, from this second day of unleavened bread, was called δευτεροπρωτον, the second δευτεροδευτερον, the second sabbath from that day; the third, δευτεροτριτον, the third sabbath from that second day, and so on till they came to the seventh sabbath from that day, that is, the forty-ninth day, which was the day of Pentecost. ... Epiphanius expressly says, our Lord's disciples did this, on the sabbath following the first day of unleavened bread.' Whitby. If this interpretation be adopted, the ears of corn plucked by the disciples must have been barley: for the wheat was not ripe till some time after. And, though the offering of wave-loaves, for the first fruits, at the feast of Pentecost, (Note, Lev. 23:15—21.) shows that some of the harvest was then gathered in; yet it does not follow, but that some might remain in the fields, unreaped, at the same time.—It should be observed, that in case there was no likelihood of any barley being fit to cut, at the time when the passover would otherwise have been celebrated; a moon, or month, was intercalated, and so the beginning of the first month was fixed to the subsequent new moon: and by the passover all the other feasts were regulated.—These are the most probable opinions on this subject, which is evidently of greater difficulty than importance.—Rubbing.] Ψωχοντες Here only N. V. 12. Our Lord spent the whole night, preceding the appointment of his apostles, alone upon a mountain, "in prayer to God." Some think that the original words signify "an oratory of God," or small building erected for retirement and devotion; and the construction of the original best suits that rendering. Jesus, however, doubtless was engaged in prayer during the whole night, whilst his disciples seem to have gone to their rest as usual.—'Christ, by choosing his twelve apostles, not without long and fervent prayer, shows what piety is needful in ecclesiastical elections, or in the choice and ordination of ministers.' Beza. (*Marg. V. 20. 'The question here raised by interpreters, whether this sermon be the same which we find mentioned Luke the sixth, or only like a sermon spoken at another time and place, is of some concern for the right understanding of the words: for if the sermon be the same in both gospels, and it were spoken only once by Christ though it be set down twice by the evangelists; the words of one evangelist must be interpreted in a sense agreeable to the other, or else they cannot both be true. Whereas, if our Lord spake the words recorded by St. Luke at any other time and place, than the discourse related by St. Matthew was delivered at, we may give different interpretations to their words: and that this was so seems highly probable. 1. Because St. Luke omits so many things recorded by St. Matthew, as parts of this discourse, viz. from the thirteenth to the thirty-ninth verse of the fifth chapter, all the sixth chapter; and from the sixth to the sixteenth verse of the seventh chapter; that is, he omits the greatest part of this sermon: ... and also added many woes. 2. ... St. Matthew doth sufficiently inform us that his sermon was delivered before the healing of the leper; for "as Christ came down from the mount, the leper came to him;" (Matt. 8:2.) whereas St. Luke ... gives us the story of the leper first, and the history of Christ's sermon after. ... Again, St. Luke reckons Matthew among those whom Christ had chosen to be of the twelve; and (17) he adds, that Christ went down with them, and preached the following sermon: whereas the sermon mentioned by St. Matthew was preached long before his calling to be one of Christ's disciples. ... Lastly, St. Matthew's sermon was preached on the mount by our Lord, calling his disciples up to him; whereas St. Luke informs us, that our Lord came down with his disciples from a mount, and stood in the plain, and from thence preached what he recorded.' Whitby on Matt. 5:1.—'Here being but four of the eight beatitudes mentioned, (Matt. 5:1—13.) and not one of these being delivered in the same words which are there used; as it is certain this must be another sermon than that on the mount, and spoken to other auditors; so it is only probable, not necessary, that they should bear the same sense.' Whitby.—The thirty-ninth, fortieth, and forty-fifth verses are not found in the sermon on the mount, but for substance in other parts of St. Matthew's gospel. (Notes, 39:40,43—45.)—Some however think, that the circumstance of a plain being here mentioned, and a mountain by St. Matthew, is not of much weight: 'our Lord, say they, might come down from the mountain with his disciples, and finding a large multitude assembled in the plain, he might reascend the mountain so far, as to be placed advantageously for being heard by the people, and his disciples might go and seat themselves around him. Both the evangelists agree that a mountain was near; both agree, that Christ had been healing considerable numbers just before he delivered this discourse. St. Luke says, that he had been praying all night in the mountain. we may naturally suppose, in the higher and more retired part of it; that he then came down, and healed the numerous afflicted persons; and that seeing the multitudes he proceeded to teach them. And after both sermons we find him entering into Capernaum, and healing the centurion's servant.'—Thus different persons view the subject very differently: but the circumstance of St. Matthew's gospel recording the sermon on the mount, not only before his own appointment to the apostolical office, but before he relates how he was called from the receipt of custom to follow Christ, seems of great weight: and several passages appear to require a different an interpretation than that which has been given of what are thought parallel passages in St. Matthew, that I scarcely know how to expound them, without adopting Dr. Whitby's conclusion; though I would by no means be confident in so controverted a point.—It seems probable, that the sermon recorded by St. Luke, being delivered at another time, and to another audience, than the sermon on the mount; our Lord saw good to inculcate the same general and important truths, with such variations, as his perfect knowledge of his hearers required.

Blessed, &c. (Note, Matt. 5:3.) 'Christ teaches, against all the philosophers, especially the Epicureans, that the chief felicity of man is laid up nowhere on earth, but in heaven; and that persecution for righteousness' sake, is the way by which we must attain to it.' Beza.—All the true disciples of Christ are "poor in spirit;" most of them are "the poor of this world;" and many become poor by forsaking all for his sake and the gospel, or parting with all from zeal for his glory: but though he knows their poverty, he declares "that they are rich," "having nothing and yet possessing all things;" "poor, yet making many rich." (Note, 2 Cor. 6:3—10, v. 10.) Poverty indeed has advantages in respect of religion: but the blessing here pronounced, belongs to no poor persons, except those who are Christ's true disciples, and "heirs of the kingdom, which God hath prepared for them that love him." (Note, Jam. 2:5—7.) Voluntary poverty, without any call to it, is no-where commanded; and it has generally been a self-righteous rival to true Christianity, and cannot here be intended. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) It was peculiarly proper, that a special blessing should be pronounced on poor disciples, who have many trials to endure; but the rich, if "poor in spirit" and crucified to the world, are not excluded from it. (Note, Jam. 1:9—11.)

V. 21—23. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 5:4,6,10—12.) It is probable, that many present were kept at a great distance from their necessary food, by attention on our Lord's instructions; and thus their natural hunger might be the effect of their "hungering after righteousness;" which would ensure their being satisfied, in due time, with divine consolations and a holy felicity. Many might also be weeping for sin, or through affliction; but being Christ's disciples they must be accounted happy, for they would surely rejoice in due time. (Notes, Ps. 126:5,6. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 7:9—11.) Indeed they would shortly be hated, excommunicated, excluded from the company of their former friends, reproached as if guilty of the most atrocious crimes, and loaded with hard names, and with infamy and disgrace, for their profession of his truth and obedience to his commandments: but instead of being dejected on these accounts, they ought to "exult with exceeding joy;" being assured that the contempt and hatred of the world, thus incurred, would be a decisive evidence of their acceptance with God, and the greatness of their future recompense: for their fathers had behaved in exactly the same manner to the prophets of old, whom God had sent among them.—'Blessed are they, who patiently suffer poverty, hunger, grief, and persecution for the sake of Christ; that they may obtain that kingdom, and that reward in heaven, he hath promised to his faithful servants.' Whitby. (Notes, Is. 51:7,8. 66:5,6. 2 Thes. 1:3—10. Jam. 5:9—11. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)

V. 24—26. Perhaps some persons, who were rich and lived in plenty and luxury, had come to make remarks on our Lord's preaching, and to deride what they heard; and these might here primarily be addressed. (Note, 16:14,15.) But in general, he intended to show his disciples the danger of riches, worldly indulgencies, and all those ruinous advantages which men so eagerly pursue; and of that pride and self-sufficiency which are commonly increased by outward prosperity. They who were not made partakers of better riches than these of you! for [u]so did their fathers to the false prophets. [Practical Observations.]

27 ¶ But I say [x]unto you which hear, [y]Love your enemies, [z]do good to them which hate you, 28 [a]Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which [b]despitefully use you.

29 And [c]unto him that [d]smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; [e]and him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid not to take thy coat also.

30 Give [f]to every men that asketh of thee; [g]and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again.

31 And [h]as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.

32 For [i]if ye love them which love you, [k]what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them.

33 And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same.

34 And [l]if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again.

35 But [m]love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again: and your reward shall be great, [n]and ye shall be the children of the Highest: [o]for he is kind unto the unthankful, and to the evil.

36 Be ye therefore [p]merciful, as your Father also is merciful. [Practical Observations.]

37 ¶ [q]Judge not, and ye shall not be judged: condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned: [r]forgive, and ye shall be forgiven:

38 Give, [s]and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your [t]bosom For [u]with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again.

39 And he spake a parable unto them, [z]Can the blind lead the blind? [y]shall they not both fall into the ditch?

40 The [z]disciple is not above his master: but every one [a]that is perfect shall be as his master.

41 And [a]why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, [b]but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

42 Either how canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyself beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye? [c]Thou hypocrite, [d]cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou [e]see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye.

43 For [f]a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

44 For every tree is known by his own fruit: [g]for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble-bush gather they [t]grapes.

coveted possessions, would soon have "received their consolation," be left finally destitute, and exchange their mirth and laughter, for weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. (*Marg. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) This might especially be intended of teachers: as the false prophets had been thus generally applauded by the Jews in former ages; so it might be inferred, that those teachers who were generally commended, even by men of bad or doubtful character, had, in like manner, soothed men's consciences, and encouraged them in some measure in their sins.—'He that will be pleasing to all, must speak things grateful to all: now that cannot be good, which is grateful to bad men. Thus the false prophets whom the Jews commended, spake to them "smooth things," (Is. 30:10.) they "prophesied lies," "because the people loved to have it so;" ... 'Unskilful instructers destroy themselves and others; for as the master is, so will the disciple be.' Beza. It cannot be expected that the scholar will excel his teacher but the complete disciple will be as his teacher, to whom he has implicitly attached himself; and not wiser or better than he. If, therefore, men follow blind guides, in their religious inquiries, they must continue in ignorance, or be deluded into error: so that it is of the greatest importance for them to take care on what teachers they attend; lest their greatest diligence, and highest attainment, should leave them short of the saving knowledge of God and of themselves.—Some, however, explain the latter verse to mean, that the genuine disciple of Christ would be like him, and be prepared to endure the cross for his sake; yet the former is the more obvious interpretation, and more suited to the context. V. 46—49. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 7:21—27.) How large a proportion of professed Christians, of all parties and creeds, fall under condemnation, when judged by this most solemn and unspeakably interesting passage! "Weighed in this balance, they are found wanting." They "call Christ Lord, Lord, and do not the things which he says." "They hear, and do not." Nay, immense numbers, of jarring sentiments in other respects, agree in this, to make the mercy of God published in the gospel, a plea for neglecting strict obedience; and an encouragement, not to repent, but to continue in the neglect of many duties, and the commission of many sins, provided they be not grossly immoral! 'If,' say they, 'we are to be judged by the law, we should be condemned, no doubt: but God is merciful, Christ came to save sinners, we are Christians, and under the new covenant; and there is no need to be so strict, or to disquiet ourselves about the event.' (Note, Jam. 2:8—13.) Thus countless multitudes, who exclaim vehemently against the supposed antinomian tendency of the doctrines of grace, and the antinomian principles of some that profess to believe them, are themselves practical antinomians. They sin on, because God is merciful, and habitually neglect self-denying obedience, because Jesus came to "save us from our sins." (Note, Rom. 6:1,2.) This will most awfully appear at the day of judgment; and the question, with which the passage begins, will suffice to stop the mouths of millions, and to leave them silent in darkness and despair. (Note, Rom. 3:19,20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19. The Lord Jesus will vindicate his disciples against the false and frivolous accusations of their enemies; but he will not allow them to neglect his ordinances and commandments: yet how often do nominal Christians take occasion, from his concessions respecting the sabbath, to spend this holy day in sloth, indulgence, worldly employments, or vain company and dissipation! (Notes, Ex. 20:8—10. Is. 58:13,14.) This, however, neither consists with his authority and glory, as "the Lord of the sabbath;" nor yet with the real good of man, for whose advantage it was instituted. Let us then follow our Saviour to the places of public worship, on that day of sacred rest; or rather, let us meet him in his house and at his table; (Note, Matt. 18:19,20.) and imitate him in devoting it to the various duties of piety and charity, to the care of our own souls and of those that are connected with us; and in endeavouring to preserve the lives, or alleviate the miseries, of our brethren around us. And if, after all, the enemies of true religion be "filled with madness," and consult to injure us; let us retire and give ourselves up to fervent prayer, and "continue instant in it," according to the difficulty and importance of our work and station.—Serious consideration and earnest prayer should precede the appointment of men to the sacred ministry: and all concerned in so momentous a work, should observe and copy the example of Christ, when he ordained his apostles. Those who have thoughts of being thus employed, should retire seriously to examine their motives, and to seek the divine direction, assistance and blessing; and all Christians should join in prayer "to the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest," and that there may no more be any covetous treacherous Judas, among those who sustain that sacred character. But, in this and in every other particular, at how great a distance do the disciples follow their Lord! Thousands of the votaries of pleasure frequently pass whole nights in the pursuit of it: but how rare for a Christian, or a minister, even in the most important and arduous circumstances, to devote a single night to retired prayer and supplication, or even to abridge himself of any considerable measure of his sleep for that purpose!—Men regard the diseases of their bodies as greater evils than those of their souls; but the Scripture teaches us to form a contrary judgment: for if we could have access to Jesus, and obtain from him the most perfect cure of every disease, and the greatest degree of health and long life, which fallen man ever possessed; without deliverance from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, by the efficacy of his blood, and the energy which proceeds from him, we must be miserable to all eternity. Yet how few in proportion earnestly apply to him for this inestimable benefit! (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8.)

V. 20—26. We may easily discover that there is but little faith among professed Christians; while we observe how eagerly they seek happiness, in those things on which Jesus has pronounced a wo; and how they shun those circumstances, in which he declares that true happiness may be found. Yet poverty, scanty subsistence, affliction, and contempt, when connected with humility, godly sorrow, faith, and an earnest desire after the blessings of salvation; conduce more even to present comfort, than all the riches, splendour, luxury, and carnal mirth of ungodly men. (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) The former tends to weaken all those evil propensities, which the latter more and more inflames: and a peaceful conscience, a submissive will, a contented mind, communion with God, well regulated affections, and the hope of heaven, will render a Christian more happy in a cottage or a dungeon, than a prince can be in a palace, with a guilty conscience, a proud heart, a stubborn will, furious passions, and the fear of death, and all its terrifying consequences. (Notes, Ps. 37: Matt. 5:4,5,7,8. P. O. 1—12.) To the poor, humble, and despised believer, the kingdom of heaven exclusively belongs: there his best desires will be eternally satisfied, his tears will be changed for triumphant songs of joy, and "his reward will be great" in the blessed society of the holy prophets and apostles; and in that of the incarnate Son of God, who passed the same way to his glory. On the other hand, when a few fleeting years are gone, the rich luxurious sinner will "lift up his eyes in hell," at the utmost distance from all consolation, and his unsatisfied desires will there for ever torment him: the giddy mirth of the dissipated will be turned into bitter weeping; and the laughter of the scorner will terminate in doleful wailings and lamentations. May these reflections be made effectual, by the Spirit of God, to rectify our judgments, and to direct our choice to "that good part which shall never be taken from us;" and teach us to prefer the reproach and the cross of Christ, to all the temporal pleasure of sin, or the applause of an ungodly world. (Note, Heb. 11:24—26.) Nor ought any one to be disquieted, when he hears worldly men who teach smooth doctrines and "prophesy deceits," applauded on every side; even if this be attended with invidious, slanderous, and malicious reflections on those who are less complaisant to the fashions and customs of a wicked world. Thus the false prophets, whom God abhorred, were generally applauded, even by his professed worshippers; whilst the true prophets, who "declared his whole counsel," were hated, reproached, and persecuted, as if they had been the basest of mankind.—But it is unspeakably better to have the blessing of God, amidst man's contumely and execration, than to be abhorred by him while "all men speak well of us."

V. 27—36. We should be careful that our faithfulness, in professing or preaching the truth of God, be not leavened with moroseness or resentment. Our attention ought therefore to be continually directed to those precepts, which require us to "love our enemies," and to pray for our revilers and persecutors: and the bolder and more decided we are in the cause of God, the more pliant and passive we ought to be in our own concerns. (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.) We should in many things recede quietly from our due, and meekly submit to injuries and provocations: and at the same time we ought to persevere in "doing to others, as we would they should do to us," and in unwearied acts of kindness to the most perverse and ungrateful of our enemies. Such a conduct will evince us to be "the children of the Highest, who is kind unto the unthankful and evil;" and ensure a large and gracious recompense from him: and it will prove the superior excellency of our doctrines above all other systems; and the efficacy of the sanctifying grace on which we profess to depend. Whereas, if Christians love those alone who love them, and do good to such as do good to them; in what are their religion and principles discriminated from those of heathens, who do the same? Let us then "do good and lend, hoping for nothing again;" and let us aim to be merciful to the miserable and the guilty, even according to the mercy of our heavenly Father to us poor perishing sinners. (P. O. Matt. 5:33—48. Rom. 12. 17—21.)

V. 37—49. To avoid giving needless offence, we should

CHAPTER VII.

Jesus commends the faith, and heals the servant, of a centurion, 1—10. He raises a widow's son at Nain, 11—17. He sends back the messengers of John the Baptist, with an account of his miracles, 18—23; bears testimony to John, 24—30; and exposes the perverseness of the people, respecting both John, and himself, 31—35. He is entertained by a Pharisee, 36. A woman of previous bad character washes and anoints his feet, 37—39. He justifies to the Pharisee his conduct towards her by a parable; and shows that she loved much, and that her many sins were pardoned, 40—50.

NOW [a]when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, [b]he entered into Capernaum.

2 And a certain [c]centurion's servant, [d]who was dear unto him, [e]was sick, and ready to die.

3 And when he heard of Jesus, he sent unto him the elders of the Jews, [f]beseeching him that he would come and heal his servant.

4 And when they came to Jesus, they besought him instantly, saying, That he was [g]worthy for whom he should do this;

5 For [h]he loveth our nation, [i]and he hath built us a synagogue.

6 Then [k]Jesus went with them. And when he was now not far from the house, the centurion sent friends to him, saying unto him, Lord, [l]trouble not thyself; [m]for I am not worthy that thou shouldest enter under my roof:

7 Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: [n]but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed.

8 For I also [o]am a man set [p]under authority, having under me [q]soldiers; and I say unto [r]one [p]Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and [s]he doeth it.

9 When Jesus heard these things, [t]he marvelled at him, and turned him about, and said unto the people that followed him, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, [r]not in Israel.

10 And they that were sent, returning to the house, [u]found the servant whole that had been sick.

11 ¶ And it came to pass the day after, that [v]he went into a city called Nain: and many of his disciples went with him, and much people.

12 Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, [w]the only son of his mother, and she was [x]a widow: [y]and much people of the city was with her.

13 And when the Lord saw her, [z]he had compassion on her, and said unto her, [a]Weep not.

14 And he came and touched the [†]bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, [b]Young man, I say unto thee Arise.

15 And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. [c]And he delivered him to his mother.

16 And there came [d]a fear on all: and [e]they glorified God, saying, That [f]a great prophet is risen up among us; and, That [g]God hath visited his people.

17 And [h]this rumour of him went forth throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about. [Practical Observations.] carefully abstain from all rash and rigorous decisions about men's motives, state, and character. Our great business is to judge ourselves; and not to judge another's servants, who must stand or fall to their own Master. (Notes, Rom. 14: 2—4,10—12.) We should never be backward to forgive any kind or degree of injury, as we hope to be forgiven by God for Christ's sake: and we may rest satisfied that we shall not be losers in the event, by the most liberal and abundant kindness to others, according to our measure of ability, and as far as consists with other duties: for it shall assuredly be "measured to us by the same measure with which we mete to others," whether that be more large or more scanty.—These extensive and most excellent precepts, as well as the evangelical principles connected with them, are overlooked or explained away by "blind guides," of whom every one ought to beware; for they are falling into the ditch together with their followers, in great multitudes, continually, on every side of us. And as "the disciple is not above his Master," let us be indeed the disciples of Christ alone: that, following his instructions and example, and regarding no man further than he declares the truth and bears the image of Christ, we may grow up into conformity to him, till at length we become "perfect even as our Master is perfect." Let us also seek to subdue our own evil tempers, and break off our sins, before we set up for censors or reformers of others; lest Jesus should check our officiousness by saying, "Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye." As then the tree is known by its fruits, may the truth, as taught by Jesus and his apostles, be grafted in our hearts, that we may be fruitful in every good word and work; and that instructive discourse may be as natural to us, as corrupt conversation is to ungodly men. In vain do we call Christ, "Lord, Lord," or even call on him to rescue us from condemnation, if we do not the things which he says. May we then wisely come to him, hear his words, and "do them;" that we may with diligence "dig deep," to lay the foundation of our hope upon a Rock. Thus when unbelievers of every name, whether they reject, despise, oppose, or pervert the gospel, shall be driven with all their presumptuous confidences into everlasting ruin; we shall dwell securely, weather out every storm, and have at last "a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (P. O. Matt. 7:13—29.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1—10. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 8:5—13.) 'Thus is Christ said to have "preached peace" to the Ephesians, which personally he did not, but by his apostles. ... Notwithstanding, St. Luke, willing to add one evidence more of the centurion's humility, from the reason of his not going personally unto Christ, chooses rather to set it down exactly as it was, in each circumstance, than only in brief ... as St. Matthew had done.' Hammond.—The centurion's liberal affection for the worshippers of the true God, shown in building them a synagogue at his own expense, is also added by St. Luke, as what had peculiarly tended to soften the prejudices of the Jews, and to conciliate their favour towards him. "And he himself has built the synagogue for us."—The favour shown an officer in the army, by which the conquerors held the nation in subjection; and the earnestness with which the elders pleaded the cause of an uncircumcised Gentile, is not the least wonderful circumstance in the narrative. It attests in the strongest manner the excellency of his character; and shows the power of persevering good and kind behaviour, to overcome the prejudices of those who witness them, and share the benefit.

Dear unto him. (2) Ἔντιμος αὐτῳ. 14:8. Phil. 2:29. 1 Pet. 2:4,6.—1 Sam. 26:21. Sept.—Instantly. (4) Σπουδαιως. Tit. 3:13. Not elsewhere N. T.—Hath built us a synagogue. (5) Την συναγωγην ᾠκοδομησεν ἡμιν. "He hath built the synagogue for us:" probably there was only one at Capernaum.

V. 11—17. It does not appear that our Lord ever went to Nain, except on this occasion. It is supposed to have been distant about twelve or thirteen miles from Capernaum; and he seems to have taken this journey on purpose to perform the compassionate miracle here recorded. For when he came, with numerous attendants, to the entrance of the city, he met a company of people carrying a dead man out to bury him. He was the only son of a widow woman, who, it may well be supposed, had been the support and comfort of her declining years; and every circumstance tended to render her affliction peculiarly distressing: and as the funeral was attended by great numbers, the miracle which ensued would be more fully attested, and generally known. When our Lord, therefore, saw the afflicted widow following the corpse, he "had compassion on her," and bade her weep no more: he then touched the bier on which the body lay, for those who carried it stood still, perhaps with some degree of expectation, as the rumour of his other miracles must have reached them. Upon which he said, as one possessed of divine authority and power, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise;" and immediately he that had "been dead sat up, and began to speak, and Jesus delivered him to his mother," that he might still live to be a comfort to her. (Marg. Ref. t—c.)—The evangelist has left us to conceive of the emotions of her heart on this occasion, to which no words could possibly do justice: but he informs us, that an awe and fear of the divine power of Jesus fell upon the spectators: and that they "glorified God" for his mercy, and thanked him for having "visited his people," and raised up such a prophet among them. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, Mark 5:35—43, vv. 41—43. John 11:41—46. Acts 9:36—43.) But though the rumour of this extraordinary miracle spread even to Judea, and through all the adjacent regions, yet we do not find that any one expected a similar miracle in the case of Jairus's daughter. (Note, Mark 5 22—24.)—'What can exceed the beautiful simplicity of these 18 ¶ And [t]the disciples of John showed him of all these things.

19 And John calling unto him [k]two of his disciples, sent them to Jesus, saying, [l]Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?

20 When the men were come unto him, they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?

21 And in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and [m]plagues, and of evil spirits: and unto many that were blind he gave sight.

22 Then Jesus answering, said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard: [n]how that the blind see, [o]the lame walk, [p]the lepers are cleansed, [q]the deaf hear, [r]the dead are raised, [s]to the poor the gospel is preached.

23 And [t]blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me.

24 ¶ And when the messengers of John were departed, he began to speak unto the people concerning John, [u]What went ye out into the [x]wilderness for to see? [y]a reed shaken with the wind?

25 But what went ye out for to see? [z]A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, [a]are in king's courts.

26 But what went ye out for to see? [b]A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, [c]and much more than a prophet.

27 This is he of whom it is written, [d]Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.

28 For I say unto you, [e]Among those that are born of women, there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: [f]but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he.

29 And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, [g]justified God, [h]being baptized with the baptism of John.

30 But the Pharisees and lawyers [*]rejected [i]the counsel of God [i]against themselves, being not baptized of him.

31 ¶ And the Lord said, [k]Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like?

32 They [l]are like unto [m]children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept.

33 For John the Baptist [n]came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, [o]He hath a devil.

34 The Son of man is come [p]eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold, a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, [q]a friend of publicans and sinners!

35 But [r]wisdom is justified of all her children.

verses? In particular, that simple, yet touching enumeration, which occurs in the twelfth verse, is a pure classical beauty. Common writers either overlook such circumstances, and fail to arrange them in the delicate order which gives them their effect; or they dwell so much on them as to excite weariness and disgust. A similar instance occurs in the contrast towards the close of this chapter. (44—46.) Few minds are so acute in their first perceptions, as thus to catch every circumstance which properly enters into a parallel, or a contrast, and to exclude all fanciful agreements and oppositions; and few who catch them can thus exhibit them without parade. This clearness of conception, united with such simple and unembarrassed communication, is, I conceive, true classical excellence. St. Luke particularly abounds in these instances. Those petulant critics who spurn him away from a comparison with Xenophon, can only support their sentence by maintaining that his Greek is not Attic.—The walk to Emmaus may challenge a comparison with any work of any master.—St. Luke leaves the mind full of pictures, produced, not by height of colouring, but by exquisite and simply natural description.—Thus it is especially with the first two chapters of this gospel, and the first chapters of the Acts of the Apostles. These paint themselves on the fancy and memory, on every perusal.'

V. 18—35. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 11:1—19.—John. (18) 'John from the prison sends his unbelieving disciples to Christ himself, to be confirmed: that hearing and seeing him, they might by him be instructed, from whom they had otherwise fled, out of a preposterous emulation.' Beza.—In that same, &c. (21) What a view does this verse give us of the number and variety of our Lord's miracles! The word rendered "gave," seems to express how highly gratifying the gift of sight was to those who had been blind; and in what a gracious and kind manner our Lord bestowed it, as taking pleasure in imparting so welcome a gift.—Blessed. (23) 'He adds this, to correct the preposterous emulation of John's disciples, who envied the honour of Jesus, as eclipsing that of John:... but again, lest any should suppose that he meant to censure John himself, he subjoins a commendation of his office, which he places in the middle between the prophets and his own coming. (28)... The predictions of the prophets are compared with John's pointing out Christ to the people; and that again with the exhibition given of him in the gospel. At the same time it is shown, that as much as the second discovery excelled the first, so much did the third excel the second.' Beza.—And all, &c. (29,30.) It is not evident, whether these verses are a continuation of Christ's discourse, or the evangelist's remark upon the effects produced by it: our translation favours the latter supposition, yet the most approved expositors incline to the former.—If they were the words of Christ, they called the attention of his hearers to the effects produced by John's ministry. The common people, and even the publicans, and others of bad moral character, had been induced by it "to justify God;" for they acknowledged the justice of the punishment which was denounced against them for their sins; and their need of repentance, forgiveness, and a change of heart and life: and, professing these things, they had received his baptism, and had regarded, in some measure, his testimony to Jesus as the promised Messiah. But the Pharisees and scribes generally rejected his ministry, and were not baptized by him; and thus they rendered "the counsel of God," in sending him to prepare the way of Christ, of none effect, as far as they were concerned; and they despised the warnings and denunciation which John addressed to them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i. Note, Matt. 21:28—32.) Hence the people might infer that their pride and hypocrisy were more adverse to spiritual religion, than the ignorance or profligacy of others, or even of the publicans; that they might be expected to be the inveterate enemies to Jesus, whose forerunner John was; and that all must be cautioned not to follow such blind guides.—If, however, we understand the passage as the words of the evangelist, it implies that the common people, and even the publicans, approved of Christ's honourable testimony to John, and expressed themselves to be well satisfied with the wisdom, justice, and goodness of God, displayed in that dispensation; to which they were the more inclined, as they had been baptized of John. But the Pharisees and scribes, who in general had refused his baptism, were displeased with our Lord's testimony to him, as it implied a severe censure on their conduct: (Note, Matt. 21:23—27.) and thus they persisted in their opposition to the counsel of God, to their own great loss and danger; proving themselves to be none of "wisdom's children," by all of whom her appointments are justified and approved. (35)—'In rejecting John's baptism, they are said to "reject the counsel of God towards them;" that is, his gracious design of calling them by him to that repentance which could alone exempt them from the wrath to come; and by that refusal declared they approved not of God's counsel, as just and righteous, in calling such unblamable persons as they were, and such zealots for the law, to repentance, that so they might escape the ruin threatened by John. For thus Eleazar, one of them, speaks, after the destruction of the Jews, that though all the rest of the Jews perished,... we alone expected to be preserved, as having not sinned against God, nor been guilty of any fault, and who were teachers to others. Christ tells us, that they "were confident in themselves, that they were righteous;" ..and represents them by the elder son, saying, "I never transgressed at any time thy commandment." (15,29.) They therefore judged it an incongruous thing, to call such righteous persons to repentance; and threaten them with ruin who were so dear to God. But the publicans and common people were conscious to themselves of sins, sufficient to expose them to divine judgments; and therefore they approved of this counsel God sent to them by his messenger; and declared him righteous, both in calling them to repentance, and threatening his judgments if they did neglect it.' Whitby.—It is probable, that many of the scribes and Pharisees who came to John, hearing his exhortations and warnings, declined his baptism, or at least that the rest of the body stood aloof from him. V. 36. When our Lord had concluded his discourse, a Pharisee, named Simon, who was present, invited him to eat with him. This man seems to have been considerably impressed with what he had seen and heard; but his prejudices were strong, and he was yet in suspense whether Jesus was, or was not, a prophet. It is probable, therefore, that he invited him to his house, in order the more narrowly to observe and scrutinize all his words and actions: and he seems to have had others about him in the same state of mind. (49. Notes, 11:37,38. 14:1—6.) Our Lord, however, was always ready to show a friendly and sociable disposition, and to embrace every occasion of doing good: he therefore accepted the invitation, and, having entered his house, he immediately sat down to meat; or, reclined on the couch, according to the custom of the Jews at that time. For the Pharisee, as it appears, considering Jesus as a poor man, and having no proper sense of his real excellency and dignity, did not show him even the customary tokens of respect or affection. (44—46.)

V. 37—39. While our Lord was at the Pharisee's table, a woman, an inhabitant of the city, who was of known bad character, having formerly been a harlot, as it is generally supposed, came into the room.—Tradition reports that this was Mary Magdalene, but there is no scriptural proof of it: and indeed what is said of Mary Magdalene, or Mary of Magdala, in other places, renders it improbable; as she is spoken of, rather as one, who had been remarkably afflicted, than peculiarly wicked. (Note, Mark 16:9—11.)—This woman, however, had heard our Lord's instructions with great attention; and had been led to a deep conviction of her guilt and danger, and to unfeigned repentance: and, being thus prepared to receive the truth, she seems to have believed him to be the promised Messiah, a spiritual Redeemer, the Saviour of sinners. She therefore longed to hear more of his convincing and encouraging instructions, and also to express her love and gratitude to him: and, in the fulness of her heart, she followed him into the Pharisee's house, having taken with her an alabaster-box of valuable ointment, which probably she had been accustomed before to use for far other purposes. Coming thus behind him as he reclined at meat, his presence and conversation so affected her, with a remembrance of her former sins, and with a sense of his grace and mercy, that she wept abundantly: and, as his feet were bare, (his sandals having been put off,) she rained tears plenteously upon them, wiping them at the same time with her neglected dishevelled hair: and kissing them, in the most humble, respectful, and affectionate manner, she anointed them with the ointment. But when the Pharisee saw this interesting scene, instead of rejoicing in these tokens of her repentance, he confined his thoughts entirely to her former scandalous character; and began to form a disadvantageous opinion of Jesus, because he allowed such a woman to approach him: for reasoning in his heart on the subject, he inwardly formed the conclusion, that if Jesus were a prophet, he would have known her character, and consequently would have driven her from his presence, as he himself and his brethren the Pharisees would have done. (Notes, 15:1,2 18:9—14. Is. 65:3—7. Matt. 9:10—13.)—It is most surprising that many persons, (among whom have been several remarkable for learning and diligent investigation,) should have supposed that St. Luke here records the same event, which the other evangelists relate, concerning Mary, the sister of Lazarus. (Notes, Matt. 26:6—13. Mark 14:3—9. John 12:1—8.)—'This woman was "a woman of that city," either of Nain or Capernaum, the only cities here mentioned; whereas Mary, the sister of Lazarus, was of... the village of Bethany.... After the collation, which is not styled a supper, our Lord "went through every city and village, preaching the kingdom of God;" (8:1.) whereas, after he raised Lazarus, "Jesus walked no more openly." (John 11:54.) And lastly, Mary's unction was made for Christ's interment, and but six days before his last passover, when he continued in Bethany and Jerusalem. (Mark 14:11.)' Whitby.—'This was in one of the Pharisees' houses, not in Simon the leper's, nor ... in Bethany. The Pharisee objected against Christ for this; not Judas, or one of the disciples: and the objection was not the unnecessary expense, as there, but that Christ would let a sinner be so kind to him, if he knew it; or if he did not, that he was no prophet. And then the discourse between Christ and Simon, ... is far distant from that in the other gospels, of anointing him for his burial:... which also contains another circumstance in it, that that of Mary's was immediately before his death, Judas going out immediately to betray him. Hammond.—To this it may be added, that it is hardly conceivable, a supper should have been made for Jesus, after Lazarus was raised from the dead, at which Lazarus was a guest, and Martha waited, and which was evidently done in honour of Christ; while the person who entertained the company doubted of his being a prophet, because the sister of Lazarus his guest, and of Martha who waited, was permitted to touch him. And it is equally inconceivable that the Jews should throng to the house of "Martha and Mary to comfort them concerning their brother;" if the character of Mary had been so infamous, that it was enough to induce suspicion against one, who was so eminent for his miracles and doctrine, that he permitted her to touch him.—There is every reason to think, that Mary, the sister of Lazarus and Martha, was, like her brother and sister, in all respects, a person of approved character, even among such as did not receive Jesus as the Messiah: and though the circumstances of the alabaster-box, the anointing of our Lord's feet, and wiping them with her hair, and "the leper" being called Simon, as well as "the Pharisee," seem at first glance to give some plausibility to the opinion; yet the more carefully the connexion of the narrative, the time, the place, the discourse, the woman's motive, the commendation bestowed on each, and indeed the whole account, is considered, the more complete must be the reader's conviction, that two entirely different persons, and two distinct transactions are intended.—The apostle John indeed records, that Mary anointed Christ's "feet:" but St. Luke never intimates, that this woman anointed "his head," as two evangelists do of Mary. This was more suited to the respectful and affectionate freedom of one long honoured with the Saviour's friendship, than with the weeping trembling diffidence of a new convert, whose life had been notoriously scandalous.

V. 40—43. Whilst Simon imagined he had obtained a decisive proof that Jesus was not a prophet, our Lord answered to his inmost thoughts in such a manner, as sufficiently evinced that he was far more than a prophet. been only hardened and irritated by it: but the manner in which Jesus addressed him was admirably suited to convince, without affronting, him. He first rivetted his attention, by intimating that he had something of importance to say to him; and he stated a case to him, desiring his opinion upon it.—The "Creditor" in this parable evidently represents God himself; the "two debtors," one of whom owed him ten times as much as the other, denote different descriptions of sinners, who are all guilty, but in various degrees, and who have no power, in any measure, to pay their debt, or atone for their own sins. (Note, Matt. 18:23—35.) As therefore two debtors, thus circumstanced, and then freely forgiven, would love their kind creditor, in some proportion to the sum remitted to them; so pardoned sinners may be supposed to love their gracious Lord, in proportion to the degree of their guilt, or rather to that of their own estimation of it. This case being proposed to Simon in the form of a question, he could not but allow, that the debtor who had been freely pardoned the larger sum, would, in all probability, have the deeper sense of his obligations, and the more lively impression of his benefactor's liberality.—The longer men live in sin, the more advantages they abuse, and the more mischief they do, the greater is their actual guilt: yet pride, and ignorance of God, of the evil of sin, and of themselves, impose on many to think their debt small, when it is indeed very large. But the convictions, which spring from divine illumination, always lead men to consider themselves as great sinners: and when they attain to a comfortable sense of forgiveness, by the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus, their love and gratitude are proportioned to the degree of their humiliation. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Eph. 3:8.)—Master, &c. (40) O teacher, speak.—Considering the state of Simon's mind; this address seems not only hypocritical, but sarcastical.

V. 44—50. Our Lord approving of Simon's answer, proceeded to apply it to the case in question: and turning to the weeping penitent, he said, "Seest thou this woman?" Simon had indeed noticed her with disdain, and thought that her presence even polluted his house; but he had not duly considered her tears of godly sorrow, and her expressions of grateful love. Our Lord, therefore, in the most beautiful manner, contrasted her conduct with that of the Pharisee. The latter had not even treated him with ordinary respect: when he came into his house, he had not so much as brought him water, with which to wash his feet; he had not welcomed him with a friendly kiss; nor given him oil, which was cheap and plentiful, to anoint his head, according to the customs on such occasions. (Marg. Ref. Gen. 29:13. Notes, Gen. 18:3—8, v. 4. Ps. 2:10—12, v. 12.) But this despised woman had "washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair;" she had incessantly kissed his feet from her first entrance into the room, and had anointed them with costly and fragrant ointment. Therefore, though her sins had been very many and aggravated, even far more and greater than Simon supposed, they were all "forgiven, for she loved much." Many expositors would render it, "Therefore she loved much," though they allowed this use of the Greek particle to be very uncommon. But there seems no occasion for the alteration: and in fact no indisputable instance of its being used in this sense has ever been produced.—Her love was not the cause of her forgiveness, which is ascribed to her faith, (50) but it was an evidence of it; for it proved the sincerity of her repentance and faith in Christ, from which her forgiveness might with certainty be inferred. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. John 21:15—17. 1 Cor. 16:22—24, v. 22. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Eph. 6:21—24, v. 24. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.)—Indeed, if her love to Christ had arisen from the assurance that her sins were forgiven; there would have been no occasion for him repeatedly to assure her that they were: but he pointed out the effects of her fervent love, both to comfort her drooping heart, and to silence her rigorous judges. The word, rendered "wherefore, (47) signifies On account of which, or, For the sake of which, and seems at least to induce as much difficulty as that translated "for." But the verse may perhaps be thus paraphrased, as it stands in the context:—'Observing these effects of this woman's love and gratitude, it is reasonable on account of them, as evidences of her repentance and faith, to conclude that her numerous sins are pardoned; because it is plain that "she loveth much;" and so the depth of her repentance, and the sincerity of her faith, are put beyond all doubt. (Note, 1 John 4:19.)—Whereas, did she think her guilt but small, yet supposed that it was pardoned: her love would be so little, and the effects so indecisive, that her real character might still continue doubtful.' Thus our Lord intimated, that the Pharisees, forming such an erroneous estimate of their own character, could not properly value salvation by grace, or love the gracious Saviour of lost sinners: and were it possible, that in this state of mind, they should be pardoned; they could only "love a little," and give him the formal cool reception that Simon had done: instead of showing, by every action, the fervent love and gratitude of this deeply humbled penitent.—It is plain, that our Lord addressed Simon, according to his own thoughts of himself, and not according to the real state of the case, when he seemed to allow that he "loved a little." This was frequently his manner; (Note, 15:25—32.) and there was something in it very conciliating, though plain and faithful.—He certainly did not treat all Pharisees alike; or pursue every one, whose heart was not right before God, with all that severity which he expressed against those who combined with their self-righteousness the most detestable hypocrisy and enormous wickedness. Some preachers and authors have perhaps too much overlooked this.—Having stated these things, our Lord more expressly declared to the woman that her sins were forgiven: and, regardless of the murmurs which this excited, he again encouraged her with the assurance that "her faith had saved her," and that she might "depart in peace" with God and her conscience, for all the blessings of his gospel belonged to her. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The grace of God is communicated to some of every rank and order in the community; and where it prevails, it influences men to a conscientious and affectionate performance of the various duties of their several relations in domestic life. When masters and servants behave properly, in their respective situations, from the fear of God, they become dear to each other. (Note, Gen. 35:8. P. O. 1—15.)—Those who love the Lord will love his people also, and will be disposed to employ their wealth or influence in promoting his worship: and such as are most worthy in the opinion of competent judges, will most honour Christ, and be most sensible of their own unworthiness.—When we have received benefits which we are unable to return; justice, as well as gratitude, requires us to beseech the Lord very earnestly in behalf of our benefactors, especially when they are under trials and afflictions: and we are most likely to obtain the greatest favours from him, when we are most sensible that we do not deserve the least. To him all things are alike easy, all creatures obey his word; and he never fails to answer the expectation of that faith which honours his power and love. —Our blessed Redeemer's heart is susceptible of pity, on account of all the distresses to which we are exposed. The weeping widow, and bereaved parent, are the peculiar objects of his compassionate regard: and, though he no longer restores their deceased relatives; yet the power which formerly effected this, can now repair every breach, dry up every tear, and cause every bleeding heart to rejoice. While many, therefore, glory in a worthless sensibility, or weep over imaginary wo with an unmeaning sympathy, and leave real misery to pine in neglect; let the Christian joyfully copy the compassion of his Lord; let him look out for those objects of distress, which often lie concealed from the superficial ob-

CHAPTER VIII.

Our Lord preaches, attended by his apostles; and by some women who ministered to him, 1—3. The parable of the sower, with its interpretation, 4—15: and that of the lighted candle, 16—18. Christ's obedient disciples are his most beloved relations, 19—21. He calms a violent tempest, 22—25; and casts out the legion, 23—39. He heals the woman who had an issue of blood, and raises Jairus's daughter, 40—56.

AND it came to pass afterward, [a]that he went throughout every city and village, preaching, and showing [b]the glad tidings of the kingdom of God: [c]and the twelve were with him.

2 And [d]certain women, which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary [e]called Magdalene, [e]out of whom went seven devils,

3 And [f]Joanna, the wife of Chuza, [g]Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, which ministered unto him [h]of their substance.

4 ¶ And [i]when much people were gathered together, and were come to him out of every city, he spake by a parable:

5 A [k]sower went out to sow his seed: and as he sowed, some [l]fell by the way-side; and it was trodden down, [m]and the fowls of the air devoured it.

6 And some fell upon [n]a rock; and as soon as it was sprung up, it withered away, because it lacked moisture.

7 And some fell among [o]thorns; and the thorns sprang up with it, and choked it.

8 And [p]other fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bare fruit, [q]an hundred fold. And when he had said these things, he cried, [r]He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

9 And his disciples asked him, saying, [s]What might this parable be?

servers of mankind; and endeavour to sooth the aching heart, to relieve the indigent, and to comfort the afflicted. In this way, he will most reasonably hope for comfort, under the troubles of life, and in the hour of death, from the stroke of which no period of age, or vigour of health, can secure him: and thus he may also look forward with joyful expectation to the time, when the Redeemer's powerful voice shall call forth all that are in the graves, either to "the resurrection of life, or to the resurrection of damnation." (Notes, John 5:24—27. 11:20—27.)—All the displays of the glorious power and majesty of the Lord, should make us fear coming short of his salvation; and all his kindness to us, or to others, should excite us to glorify him, especially for "visiting his people" and raising up a great Redeemer among them.

V. 18—35. As the beneficent miracles of Christ, above all things, proclaimed him to be the Son of God and the promised Messiah; so the effects of his gospel, in enlightening, reforming, and changing the hearts of sinners, is still a most important evidence of the divine excellency of our holy religion. Ministers ought, therefore, to be peculiarly earnest in "preaching the glad tidings of salvation to the poor," and in seeking a blessing on their doctrine; that all may see its salutary effects in the sober, righteous, and godly lives of those who favour it.—Every individual should inquire into his own motives, in going to hear the word of God, and ask himself whether he derives any benefit from it; for the true minister is a messenger sent by the Lord Jesus, to prepare the way before him, and to bring sinners to receive and obey him. But, while numbers are offended with the truths and precepts of Christ, and "reject the counsel of God against themselves," from perverse prejudices of diverse kinds; may we study to approve ourselves to be "the children of wisdom," by attending to the instructions of the sacred oracles, and adoring those mysteries and dispensations, which proud infidels and Pharisees deride and blaspheme. (P. O. Matt. 11:1—24.)

V. 36—43. Those who seek to do good to souls, must meekly bear with the perverseness of opposers, and avoid all affected moroseness; and they should endure personal slights, in order to have access to sinners, and obtain a hearing from them.—None can perceive the preciousness of Christ, or the glory of the gospel, except the broken-hearted. But while these cannot sufficiently express their self abhorrence on account of their sins, or their admiration of his mercy and grace; the self-sufficient will not only be disgusted with them, but will even think the worse of the gospel for giving encouragement to them! and men of this character often feel a deeper enmity against Christ, and his ministers and disciples, than they choose to avow. But did they know the real state of mankind and of their own souls, they must perceive the folly and wickedness of their objections: for "all," without exception, "have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26, vv. 21—23. Gal. 3:10—14,, 9—22.)—By perverting his bounty, and using even the faculties of our souls, and the members of our bodies, which he has created, as well as his other gifts, in violating his commands instead of devoting them to his service; and by refusing him the love and worship due to him, we have contracted a debt, of which we cannot in any possible way discharge the smallest part: nay, it must continue to increase as long as we live in this world; for who can render unto God all that obedience during one day, which is due on every day? Or who can perform one service, which is free from every defect or alloy of sin? Without free forgiveness we can none of us escape the wrath to come: and this, our gracious Saviour has procured by his atoning blood, that he might freely bestow it on every one who believes in him.

V. 44—50. He who is convinced of his own great sinfulness, and expects pardon and all the blessings of salvation, as "the gift of God in Jesus Christ," will in proportion become humble, patient, contented, teachable and obedient. Above all other things, he will learn to love the Saviour, in every part of his character, and to value him in all his offices: he will desire his favour, be thankful for his mercy, and zealous for his glory; he will become earnest, constant, and diligent, in endeavours to please him and to recommend his salvation; he will love his ordinances, commandments, and disciples; and value every talent in proportion as it enables him to express his love to Jesus and his cause. Thus it often happens, that "the chief of sinners," having been brought to repentance, and made joyful by a free forgiveness and salvation, become more zealous and active in obedience than other believers: "they love much, because much hath been forgiven them;" and they labour much because they love much. In the case of others, deep humiliation will always be connected with a proportionable love and willing obedience, when it is accompanied with a good hope that all their sins are pardoned. The scanty formal services, therefore, of too many prove, either that they have no proper sense of their guilt, and no just views of the preciousness of Christ, and the redeemed sinner's obligations to him; or that they "love little," because they suppose that "little has been forgiven them." But when a real and vigorous love to Christ springs from sorrow for sin, and hope of forgiveness through him, and is expressed by such methods as a man's situation admits of; we may from it safely infer that his "sins though many are forgiven;" and may thus give him great encouragement, without in the least palliating his guilt: and when the witnessing Spirit makes it evident to the believer's conscience, that he does indeed love Christ; he may know more certainly that "his sins are forgiven," than if an angel from heaven had told him so. Let who will object, and murmur at these things, Christ will assert his authority of thus forgiving sin, and of bidding the weeping penitent "depart in peace," as partaking of salvation through faith in his name.—But may not we with shame confess, that while we hope that our many and great offences are freely pardoned, we yet comparatively love but little? If this be the case, we should seek for more heart-affecting views of our own vileness, and of Christ's preciousness: we should "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" and strive to get deeper impressions of our obligations to Jesus, and expectations from him: that we may stand at a greater distance from the proud spirit of the Pharisee; that we may more simply trust and rejoice in the Saviour alone; and so be prepared to obey him more zealously, and more cordially to recommend him to our fellow-sinners on every side, and be made more meet for the society and songs of heaven. (Notes, and P. O. Rev. 5:8—14. 7:9—17.)

(3) Some have conjectured that "Chuza Herod's steward," was the nobleman, or courtier, whose son Jesus had healed. (Notes, John 4:43—54.) Doubtless, it was by his consent that his wife accompanied Jesus, when journeying to preach the gospel.—As our Lord chose to be "poor for our sakes," and did not work miracles for his own support; these pious women, who had been under the greatest obligations to him, in respect both to their souls and bodies, being also in good circumstances, were glad to communicate, from their substance, to the maintenance of him and his disciples, as well as personally to attend him: and he was pleased to stoop thus low, for an example to his servants and disciples in similar circumstances. It does not appear that any men shared this honour "of ministering to Christ of their substance."

10 And he said, [t]Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God; but to others in parables, [u]that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand.

11 Now the parable is this; [x]The seed is the word of God.

12 Those [y]by the way-side are they that hear: [z]then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved.

13 They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, [a]receive the word with joy; [b]and these have no root, [c]which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away.

14 And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, [d]and are choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, [e]and bring no fruit to perfection.

15 But that on the good ground are they, which, [f]in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, [g]keep it, and [h]bring forth fruit with patience.

16 ¶ No man, [i]when he hath lighted a candle, covereth it with a vessel, or putteth it under a bed; but setteth it on a candlestick, that they which enter in may see the light.

17 For [k]nothing is secret, that shall not be made manifest; neither any thing hid, that shall not be known and come abroad.

18 Take [l]heed therefore how ye hear: [m]for whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, [n]from him shall be taken even that which he [o]seemeth to have.

19 ¶ Then [o]came to him his mother and his brethren, and could not come at him for the press.

20 And it was told him by certain, which said, Thy mother and [p]thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee.

21 And he answered and said unto them, [q]My mother and my brethren are these [r]which hear the word of God, and do it.

22 ¶ Now it came to pass on a certain day [s]that he went into a ship with his disciples; and he said unto them, [t]Let us go over unto the other side of the lake. And they launched forth.

23 But as they sailed, [u]he fell asleep: and there [x]came down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy.

24 And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, [y]Master, master, we perish. Then [z]he arose and rebuked the wind, and the raging of the water; and they ceased, and there was a calm.

25 And he said unto them, [a]Where is your faith? And they [b]being afraid wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this? for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him. [Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And they arrived at [c]the country of the Gadarenes, which is over against Galilee.

27 And when he went forth to land, there [d]met him out of the city a certain man which had devils a long time, [e]and ware no clothes, neither abode in any house, [f]but in the tombs.

28 When he saw Jesus, [g]he cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, [h]What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? [i]I beseech thee torment me not.

29 (For he had [k]commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man. For oftentimes it had [l]caught him; and he was kept bound with chains, and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and was driven of the devil into the wilderness.)

30 And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, [m]Legion: because [n]many devils were entered into him.

31 And [o]they besought him that he would not command them to go out into [p]the deep.

32 And there was [q]there an herd of many swine feeding on the mountain: and they [r]besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them. And [s]he suffered them.

33 Then went the devils out of the man, and with damnation, is here strongly marked; and it is considered as well known to the enemy of our souls, who therefore uses all possible methods to prejudice men against the true gospel of Christ, or to render them inattentive to it. entered into the swine: [t]and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were choked.

34 When they that fed them saw what was done, [u]they fled, and went and told it in the city, and in the country.

35 Then they went out to see what was done; and came to Jesus, [x]and found the man, out of whom the devils were departed, [y]sitting at the feet of Jesus, [z]clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid.

36 They also which saw it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed.

37 Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about, [a]besought him to depart from them: for they were taken with great fear. [b]And he went up into the ship, and returned back again.

38 Now the man, out of whom the devils were departed, [c]besought him that he might be with him: but Jesus sent him away, [d]saying, 39 Return to thine own house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, [e]and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done unto him.

40 ¶ And it came to pass, [f]that when Jesus returned, [g]the people gladly received him; for they were all [h]waiting for him.

41 And, behold, [i]there came a man named Jairus, and he was [k]a ruler of the synagogue; [l]and he fell down at Jesus' feet, [m]and besought him that he would come into his house:

42 For he had [n]one only daughter, about twelve years of age, [o]and she lay a dying. [p]But as he went the people thronged him.

43 And a woman [q]having an issue of blood [r]twelve years, which [s]had spent all her living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any,

44 Came, [t]behind him, and [u]touched the borde of his garment: [x]and immediately her issue o blood stanuched.

45 And Jesus said, Who touched me? When all denied, Peter and they that were with him said, Master, [y]the multitude throng thee, and press thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?

46 And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched me: [z]for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me.

47 And when the woman saw that she was not hid, [a]she came trembling, and falling down before him, [b]she declared unto him before all the people, for what cause she had touched him, and how she was healed immediately.

48 And he said unto her, [c]Daughter, be of good comfort: [d]thy faith hath made thee whole; [e]go in peace.

49 While [f]he yet spake, there cometh one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him, Thy daughter is dead; [g]trouble not the Master.

50 But when Jesus heard it he answered him, saying, Fear not: [h]believe only, and she shall be made whole.

51 And when he came into the house, [i]he suffered no man to go in, [k]save Peter, and James, and John, and the father and the mother of the maiden.

52 And [l]all wept, and bewailed her: but he said, Weep not; [m]she is not dead, but sleepeth.

53 And they [n]laughed him to scorn, [o]knowing that she was dead.

54 And [p]he put them all out, and [q]took her by the hand, and called, saying, [r]Maid, arise.

55 And [s]her spirit came again, and she arose straightway: [t]and he commanded to give her meat.

56 And her parents were astonished: but [u]he charged them that they should tell no man what was done.

The extreme distress to which several of those who were healed by our Lord had been previously reduced, and the length of time during which they had suffered, are frequently noted by the sacred writers; both to illustrate his tender compassion of our miseries, and our desperate condition as sinners, without his most gracious and powerful interposition. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25. The ministers of Christ should copy his example of assiduity and earnestness, in "preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom of God:" and in submitting to any hardship or degradation in outward circumstances, which may conduce to the success of the gospel: and those who have profited by their labours, ought to imitate these pious women; and to use their substance in ministering unto Christ, by supporting his indigent servants and disciples, as occasion may require, and according to their ability. In this way, as well as in many others, they may "bring forth fruit with patience," and evince that the grace of God has indeed made their hearts "honest and good," and prepared them to receive the good seed of his word: for it has taken effectual root, and will certainly ripen to a glorious harvest. Indeed we should aim, by every method, to discriminate our character and conduct from those of careless hearers, of superficial and temporary professors, and of "such as are choked with the cares, riches, and pleasures of this life and bring no fruit to perfection." (P. O. Matt. 13:1—23.)

CHAPTER IX.

Jesus sends forth the twelve apostles, 1—6. He oft desires to see him, 7—9. The apostles return; Jesus retires with them, but the multitudes follow him, 10, 11. He feeds them by miracle, 12—17. The different opinions concerning him, and Peter's confession, 18—21. He foretells his death, and warns his disciples to prepare for self-denial and sufferings, 22—27. His transfiguration, 28—36: he heals a demoniac, 37—42; again foretells his death, 43—45; checks the ambitious disputes of his disciples, 46—48; will not allow them to forbid any, who "cast out devils in his name," 49, 50 reproves the fiery zeal of James and John against the Samaritans, who would not receive them, 51—56; and answers some, who were not disposed to follow him unreservedly and immediately, 57—62.

THEN [a]he called his twelve disciples together, and [b]gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases.

2 And he sent them [c]to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick.

3 And he said unto them, [d]Take nothing for your journey, neither staves, nor scrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have [e]two coats apiece.

4 And [f]whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart.

5 And [g]whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, [h]shake off the very dust from your feet for [i]a testimony against them.

6 And they departed and went through the towns, [k]preaching the gospel, and healing every where.

7 ¶ Now [l]Herod the tetrarch heard of all that was done by him: and [m]he was perplexed, because that it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead;

8 And [n]of some, that Elias had appeared; and of others, that one of the old prophets was risen again.

9 And Herod said, [o]John have I beheaded: but who is this, of whom I hear such things? [p]And he desired to see him.

10 ¶ And [q]the apostles, when they were returned, told him all that they had done. And [r]he took them, and went aside privately into a desert place, belonging to the city called [s]Bethsaida.

11 And the people, [t]when they knew it, followed him; [u]and he received them, and spake unto them [x]of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing.

12 And [y]when the day began to wear away, then came the twelve, and said unto him, [z]Send the multitude away, that they may go into the towns and country round about, and lodge, and get victuals: [a]for we are here in a desert place.

13 But he said unto them, [b]Give ye them to eat. And they said, [c]We have no more but five loaves and two fishes; except we should go and buy meat for all this people:

14 For they were about five thousand men. And he said to his disciples, [d]Make them sit down by fifties in a company.

15 And they did so, and made them all sit down.

16 Then he took the five loaves and the two fishes, [e]and looking up to heaven, [f]he blessed them, and brake, and gave to the disciples to set before the multitude.

17 And they did [g]eat, and were all filled: [h]and there was taken up of fragments that remained to them, twelve baskets.

18 ¶ And it came to pass, [i]as he was alone praying, his disciples were with him; and he asked them, saying, [k]Whom say the people that I am?

19 They answering said, [l]John the Baptist: but some say, Elias: and others say, That one of the [m]old prophets is risen again.

20 He said unto them, But [n]whom say ye that I am? Peter answering said, [o]The Christ of God.

21 And [p]he straitly charged them, and commanded them to tell no man that thing;

It is not enough for us, "not to hold the truth in unrighteousness;" we should desire to "hold forth the word of life," and to shine in our several circles, as a lighted candle in the room, for the benefit of all around. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.) Thus professing and recommending the truths of the gospel by our conduct and conversation, we shall receive more and more from our gracious God; while many "who seemed to have" knowledge, abilities, and possessions, not having had grace to make a proper use of them, will shortly be deprived of all; and their poverty, folly, and worthlessness, which were before kept secret, shall be made known to the whole world. Happy are they "who hear the word of God, and keep it!" These are the Redeemer's beloved friends and relations; every storm which arises, every peril that dismays them, will tend to excite their fervent prayers; and their Lord will awake for their help and deliverance, and cause the trial to terminate in their increasing admiration of his power and love. Yet, at times, even true believers seem to have mislaid their faith, or to have left it behind them: as they have so many anxious fears about the event, even when they are following Christ in the path of duty; concerning which alone we ought to be solicitous. (P. O. Matt. 8:23—27. 12:38—50. Mark 4:1—25.)

V. 26—56. Our own observation and experience may convince us, that the effects of sin, and of Satan's malice, fill the earth with misery: but let us advert to the varied displays of the Redeemer's power to counteract this fatal tendency. If he have delivered our souls from the power of the devil, and brought us "to sit at his feet, in our right mind," to hear his word, and to desire to be with him: he will preserve us from falling again under the dominion of sin; he will remove or sanctify our bodily sicknesses, and give us the comfort of his forgiving love; he will support us under domestic afflictions, and do us good by them; he will deliver us from the fear of death, and at length make us "more than conquerors" even over this "king of terrors." Let us then declare what great things our God and Saviour has done for us; let us commit all our concerns into his hands, and apply to him for help in all our difficulties; and let us endeavour to imitate his compassion and unwearied activity in doing good. —But, wo be to them who desire Jesus "to depart from them," through fear of worldly loss, or from love to sin! He will not stay with those who thus slight him, and perhaps may return to them no more; for others are glad to receive him, being "waiting for him;" and none but Jesus can save them from the wrath of God, or the power of Satan; or give them effectual help in the time of trouble, 'in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.' (P. O. Matt. 8:28—34. 9:18—26. Mark 5:1—43.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1—6. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10:1—12. Matt. 10:1—15. Mark 6:7—13.) The apostles had both the power of working miracles, and authority over evil spirits, immediately given them by Christ himself: in whom it was originally inherent, as One with the Father, as "God manifest in the flesh;" as well as given to him as our Mediator. (Note, Matt. 28:18.) The miracles of mercy wrought by them, proved their doctrine to be the word of God, and illustrated its benign and salutary tendency: and their holy doctrine, calling men to repent of sin and turn to God, and welcome the Saviour, promised in the Scriptures, demonstrated that their miracles were wrought by the power of God, whose word they established. (Notes, Deut. 13:1—5. Matt. 12:25—30.)—Thence, &c. (4) Remain in the same house, if convenient, till ye depart from that city.

V. 7—9. (*Marg. Ref. 22 Saying, [q]the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day.

23 And he said to them all, [r]If any man will come after me, let him [s]deny himself, and take up his cross [t]daily, and follow me.

24 For whosoever [u]will save his life shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it.

25 For [x]what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or [y]be cast away?

26 For [z]whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, [a]of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, [b]when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels.

27 But [c]I tell you of a truth, There be [d]some standing here, which shall not [e]taste of death till they [f]see the kingdom of God.

[Practical Observations.]

28 ¶ And it came to pass, [g]about an eight days after these [h]sayings, [i]he took Peter, and John, and James, and went up [k]into a mountain to pray.

29 And as he prayed, [l]the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering.

30 And, behold, there talked with him two men, [m]which were Moses and [n]Elias;

31 Who [o]appeared in glory, and [p]spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem.

32 But Peter, and they that were with him, [q]were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, [r]they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him.

33 And it came to pass, as they departed from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, [s]it is good for us to be here: [t]and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias: not knowing what he said.

34 While he thus spake, [u]there came a cloud, and overshadowed them: [v]and they feared as they entered into the cloud.

35 And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, [x]This is my beloved Son; [y]hear him.

36 And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone. [z]And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen.

37 ¶ And it came to pass, [a]that on the next day, when they were come down from the hill, much people met him.

38 And, behold, a man of the company cried out, saying, Master, I beseech thee, [b]look upon my son; [c]for he is mine only child:

39 And, [d]lo, a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly departeth from him.

40 And I besought thy disciples to cast him out; [e]and they could not.

41 And Jesus answering, said, [f]O faithless and [g]perverse generation! [h]how long shall I be with you, [i]and suffer you? [k]Bring thy son hither.

42 And as he was yet a coming, [l]the devil threw him down and tare him. And Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, and healed the child, [m]and delivered him again to his father.

43 And they were all [n]amazed at the mighty power of God. But while they wondered every one at all things which Jesus did, he said unto his disciples, 44 Let [o]these sayings sink down into your ears: [p]for the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men.

diligently sought, and the profession of it made with the greater constancy.' Beza.—Deny himself. (23) Self-denial, among other things, requires us to renounce all those advantages, and risk all those sufferings, which arise from the favour or enmity of men.—'Although the yearning bowels of a tender mother, . . . and the gray hairs of an indulgent father, should be pleaded as motives to induce me to break the least command of the holy Jesus; though the authority of civil, natural, or ecclesiastical superiors should tempt me to do what Christ forbids; though this authority should allure me with proffers of the highest honours or rewards, or should endeavour to affright me with the severest menaces; yet if all these considerations should prevail with me to gratify myself and them, by doing that which my own conscience and God's word assures me will be displeasing to my Saviour, or opposite to his commands; it is evident that I regard myself, or them, more than I do my Saviour, and therefore am unworthy of him, and cannot be sincerely his disciple.' Whitby. This learned writer proceeds in the same energetic manner to show particularly, how self-denial requires the same decision and firmness against solicitation, allurements, and upbraiding complaints, from wives, children, and other relations, where obedience to Christ is concerned: as well as to deny the cravings of our own pride, ambition, love of money, pleasure, ease; by willingly enduring reproach, contempt, poverty, imprisonment, or tortures, nay death itself, when these things cannot be shunned, except by denying, disobeying, or dishonouring our Redeemer. The subject of the conversation on the holy mount, mentioned only by this evangelist, shows that the atonement made by the death of Christ, was the great object to which Moses and the prophets, rightly understood, directed mankind. They as well as John the Baptist and the apostles, in fact say, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." (Marg. Ref. o.)—Feared, &c. 47 And Jesus, [s]perceiving the thought of their heart, [t]took a child, and set him by him, 48 And said unto them, [u]Whosoever shall receive this child in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth him that sent me: for [x]he that is least among you all, the same shall be great.

49 And John answered and said, Master, [y]we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him because he followeth not with us.

50 And Jesus said unto him, [z]Forbid him not; [a]for he that is not against us is for us.

51 ¶ And it came to pass, when the time was come [b]that he should be received up, [c]he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, 52 And [d]sent messengers before his face: [e]and they went and entered into a village of [f]the Samaritans, to make ready for him.

53 And [g]they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem.

54 And when his disciples, James and John, saw this, they said, Lord, [h]wilt thou that we command [i]fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?

55 But he turned, [k]and rebuked them, and said, [l]Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.

(50) 'In extraordinary cases, we should not rashly either condemn, or approve.' Beza. This is an observation of no little importance: for on the one hand precipitate and harsh condemnations of extraordinary appearances of a revival in religion, when it afterwards appears that God was eminently prospering his gospel, by those who followed not with these rash censurers, are very common: and so on the other, is an indiscriminate sanctioning of all that is done or observed on these occasions, as divine; when the event shows, that human infirmity and depravity, and Satan's artifice, in various ways, concurred to disgrace, if possible, and stop the good work of the Holy Spirit. To wait, to examine and observe, and impartially to distinguish between what is scriptural, and what is unscriptural, in these extraordinary events; and not to give an opinion, till the whole be maturely weighed, so as to leave but little danger, either of condemning the work of God, or of sanctioning the delusions of the devil, is a chief point of heavenly wisdom.

Master. (49) Επιστατα.—Διδασκαλε, Mark 9:38.

V. 51—56. The evangelist seems, in the conclusion of this chapter, to have recorded several detached incidents of similar import, which occurred at different times: it is not therefore needful to conclude, that the remainder of his gospel relates to events which took place during Christ's last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, or subsequent to it.—The expression here is very remarkable: "When the time was come that he should be received up," (Mark 16:19. John 6:60,61. 16:25—30. 17:4,5.) which relates to his ascension to his glory in heaven, "he steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem." He had "the eye set before him" continually in his eye, and his sufferings and crucifixion were regarded merely as preparatory steps to it: and therefore he steadfastly and constantly set his face to go up to Jerusalem, though he perfectly knew all that there awaited him; nor would he be induced by any persuasions to defer his journey. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 21:7—14.) As he went along, he sent some of his disciples as messengers before him, to make things ready for his reception, in the several places through which he passed: but when they came to a village of the Samaritans, the inhabitants would not entertain him in their houses, or admit him into the village; because they found by his route that he was on his journey to Jerusalem. They had doubtless heard of his miracles and doctrine; (Notes, John 4:5—42.) and probably were displeased at his protesting against their schismatical worship on mount Gerizim, by going up to Jerusalem to worship. This repulse so excited the indignation of James and John, that they desired permission to call for fire from heaven upon the Samaritans; as Elijah (perhaps near the same place) had done on those who were sent by king Ahaziah to apprehend him: not doubting that it would be sent at their command. (Notes, 2 Kings 1:9—14.) They did not however consider the immense difference of the two cases. The Samaritans were indeed highly blameable; but their conduct was the effect rather of national prejudices and bigotry, than of determined enmity to the word and worship of God: and though they refused to entertain Christ and his disciples; they did not attempt to persecute or murder them, according to the conduct of idolatrous Ahaziah towards the prophet Elijah: so that there was no occasion for so terrible a judgment, either to vindicate the honour of God, or to secure his servants from their enemies. Neither were the disciples aware of the different dispensation about to be introduced, which would chiefly be characterized by miracles of beneficence. Above all, they were not duly sensible of the prevailing state of their own hearts: they supposed themselves to be actuated by zeal for the honour of their Lord; but pride, ambition, resentment, and bigotry, in reality instigated them to make so improper a proposal. (Note, 2 Kings 10:15,16.) For when the inhabitants of Nazareth behaved far worse to Jesus, than these Samaritans did, they had not thought of calling for miraculous judgment; (Note, 4:23—30.) but the Nazarenes, and others who slighted or injured Jesus, were Jews, and therefore the disciples were more disposed to bear it from them, than from the despised and detested Samaritans. Elijah on the contrary was actuated by a zeal for the honour of God, and a regard to the real good of his people, who were about to be ruined by the abominable idolatries and persecutions of Ahab's family: so that they whom the fire from heaven consumed at his word, fell sacrifices to the justice of God, and their death greatly conduced to the benefit of Israel, whereas had these Samaritans been destroyed, they would have been sacrificed to the disciples' prejudices and resent-

61 And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee: [x]but let me first go bid them farewell which are at home at my house.

62 And Jesus said unto him, [y]No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.

ment, and the consequences would have been injurious to both Jews and Samaritans.—Our Lord, therefore, sharply rebuked the disciples, assuring them, that "they knew not what manner of spirit they were of:" they were not aware under what influence they spake, or what dispositions predominated in their hearts; for they desired to destroy the lives of their enemies, instead of overcoming them with persevering kindness. Whereas he, "the Son of man," was come to preserve and restore men's lives, as well as to save their souls; his miracles were uniformly acts of mercy; his gospel was not to be propagated by fire and sword, but by more rational and beneficent means; and the effects of it would be to terminate these furious contests, as far as it truly prevailed. Accordingly, without any dispute with the Samaritans, he led the disciples forward to another village.—What our Lord said against calling for fire from heaven upon the Samaritans, is still more forcibly conclusive against every kind and degree of persecution. The Samaritans were really schismatics and heretics, and they openly rejected Christ himself. Whatever, therefore, has been urged, concerning the tendency of penalties and severities, to reclaim heretics and schismatics, or to prevent others from joining them, and to preserve the unity of the church, or the honour of its ministers; indeed, every topic which persecutors, whether popish or protestants, have urged, or can urge, on this subject, is shown by our Lord's answer to be perfectly nugatory; and they who plead for the necessity of secular authority to promote religion, "know not what manner of spirit they are of." It is also to be considered, that it is one thing to appeal to God, and wait his decision, whether he will miraculously interpose, which was all that the apostles required; and another, and a widely different thing indeed, to take the cause out of his hands, and to execute vengeance on opposers, by the arm of man, and according to his sentence, without any possibility of certainly knowing whether God does or does not approve what we are doing: one thing to call for fire from heaven, and another to kindle fires on earth, to consume men branded as heretics. But Jesus came to save, and not to destroy the souls of men.

V. 57—62. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 8:18—22.) Some of these incidents seem to have occurred early in our Lord's ministry: but the last we have not before met with. The desire of this person to go home, and bid farewell to his friends, and to settle his temporal concerns, before he attached himself to Christ as his constant follower, was no doubt the effect of a wavering and undetermined state of mind: Jesus therefore answered his request, by applying to his case a proverbial expression, which seems to have been frequently used. If a man should "put his hand to the plough," and then look behind him, he could not make his furrows straight, and of a proper depth; thus no one could be expected to transact any business in a proper manner, if his attention were fixed on some other object. No man therefore can be fit to be a preacher of the gospel, whose heart hankers after those worldly interests or pleasures which he has left behind; and who looks back with a desire of recovering them, even when outwardly employed in the work of the Lord. The proverb applies to the subjects, as well as to the ministers, of "the kingdom of God;" but the latter seem especially intended. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—27. The Lord Jesus is the Fountain of power and authority, to whom all creatures must in one way or other be subjected: and if he accompany the word of his ministers with efficacy, to deliver sinners from Satan's bondage they need not fear but he will procure them needful sustenance; and more they ought not to desire. They should always show a kind attention to the temporal comforts of mankind, while they seek their eternal salvation; and when this is attended with an evident indifference to their own ease and accommodation, it tends much to conciliate good-will: if they can therefore, by ordinary means, do any thing to relieve the distresses, and heal the diseases, of those among whom they labour, it may help to promote the success of their ministry But when truth and love, in this manner, go hand in hand, and the message of God is yet rejected and despised; it will leave men most inexcusable, and every circumstance will turn to a testimony against them. (P. O. Matt. 10:1—15.)—The increase of faithful ministers, and the success of the gospel, frequently cause great perplexity and distress to those who set themselves to oppose the cause of God: and they who have shed innocent blood, will often have their guilt brought to remembrance, with renewed and increased terror and dismay, as long as they live; yea, except they truly repent, and seek and find mercy, to all eternity. (Note, Gen. 42:21,22.)—While the blessed Jesus consults the benefit and comfort of his disciples, and readily receives all who come to him; healing the souls of those who feel their need of it and seek it from him, and feeding all who hunger for the "Bread of life;" let us learn to communicate liberally to the necessities of our brethren; and even if poor ourselves, to share our mean and scanty morsel with those who are in more urgent and immediate want. By the blessing of God, a little will in this use of it go far, and we shall never by so doing be impoverished.—After our Lord's example also, ministers, parents, and heads of families should pray with, as well as for, those who are intrusted to their care: and their retired conversation should be attended by social devotions, which will often render it as profitable as public ordinances.—Those who are established in one important doctrine of the gospel, will be prepared to understand others connected with it: and those truths which relate to the person, the sufferings, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, form the very substance or centre of true religion. In meditating on his crucifixion, and the glory which ensued, we shall best learn "to deny ourselves and to bear our cross daily:" we shall thus be induced to renounce the friendship and venture the enmity of the world: we shall, in this glass, see the folly and madness of seeking the largest temporal advantages, with the hazard of "losing ourselves and being cast away;" and we shall get the victory over that foolish and wicked shame, which causes so very many to forsake and disobey Christ, against the convictions of their own consciences; though he has expressly declared, that "he will be ashamed" of all such, "when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels." (P. O. Matt. 14:6—21. 16:21—28.)

V. 28—45. To form some faint conception of the Redeemer's glory, now in heaven, and at his future appearance to judge the world, let us contemplate him upon the mount, when "the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering," like the lightning. With this scene before our eyes, we may meditate with advantage on "his decease which he accomplished at Jerusalem;" and thence follow him with our thoughts to his present exaltation in heaven, where he is surrounded by his saints, who there appear with him in glory, and expatiate in his praises. This may reconcile us to our present trials, and prepare us for the stroke of death; that we may go to behold and share that glory, one glimpse of which has sometimes made those favoured with it to say, "It is good for us to be here." But we must now walk by faith, and hear obediently the words of the beloved Son of God; treasuring up every comfortable experience of his love, and every discovery of his majesty and excellency, to be our support in "the days of darkness." Thus we may maintain a successful conflict with the enemies of our souls: and in the exercise of a vigorous faith, we may hope to be instrumental in rescuing some of our fellow-sinners from their destructive influence. But if we would be useful to others, we must seek to have our own minds delivered from every prejudice: and when we find ourselves unable to understand the words of Christ; we should not fear or neglect to ask him, and to consult his more experienced servants, concerning them. (P. O. Matt. 17:1—13. Mark 9:1—13.)

V. 46—56. Alas! our reasonings and discussions (instead of being directed to mutual edification) are too often mere disputes, "which of us should be the greatest." This may be, and in general is, very speciously disguised; but applause, popularity and precedency, are vastly too much aimed at,

CHAPTER X.

Jesus sends out seventy disciples, to work miracles and preach: and pronounces a woe against Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, 1—16. The seventy return with joy at their success: and Christ instructs them in what they should rejoice, 17—20. He adores the Father, for revealing his gospel to the simple only; and declares his own personal and mediatorial authority and glory, 21, 22: and the happiness of his disciples, 23, 24. A lawyer inquires what he must do to inherit eternal life; and Jesus refers him to the law of God, 25—28; and shows him by the example of a good Samaritan, who is his neighbour, 29—37. He commends Mary's attention to his doctrine, and reproves Martha, who was "cumbered about much serving," 38—42.

AFTER [a]these things the Lord appointed other [b]seventy also, and sent them [c]two and two before his face, into every city and place, [d]whither he himself would come.

2 Therefore said he unto them, [e]The harvest truly is great, but [f]the labourers [g]are few: [h]pray ye therefore [i]the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest.

3 Go your ways: behold, [k]I send you forth as lambs among [l]wolves.

4 Carry [m]neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes: [n]and salute no man by the way.

5 And [o]into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house.

6 And if [p]the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it: if not, [q]it shall turn to you again.

7 And [r]in the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give: [s]for the labourer is [t]worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house.

8 And into whatsoever city ye enter, and [t]they receive you, [u]eat such things as are set before you;

9 And heal the sick that are therein; and say unto them, [x]the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

10 But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, [z]go your ways out into the streets of the same, and say, 11 Even the very dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you: [a]notwithstanding, be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

12 But I say unto you, [b]That it shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city.

13 Wo [c]unto thee, Chorazin! wo unto thee, Bethsaida! [d]for if the mighty works had been done [e]in Tyre and Sidon [f]which have been done in you, by professed Christians, and even by ministers. These thoughts of our foolish hearts Jesus perceives; and a little child is his constant emblem, by which to teach us simplicity and humility. But if indeed we be his disciples, we need not be ambitious of further honour: for not only are apostles, prophets, and evangelists, distinguished persons; but the least of the whole company of believers, though insignificant among his brethren as an infant, and as much disregarded by them in all their concerns, is and shall be great, as a child and friend of God, an heir of heaven, and a future companion and compeer to the angels before the throne. "Such honour have all his saints:" and as every one, who in any place or form, successfully preaches "repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," is instrumental in bringing the slaves of Satan to partake of these glorious and everlasting privileges; surely we should not presume to forbid those "who cast out devils in Christ's name, because they follow not with us!" lest he rebuke us for our officiousness, and remind us that "he who is not against us is for us."—But, while we are zealous, courageous, and patient to endure hardship in the work of the Lord; let us also look well to our own spirits, lest we be betrayed into dishonourable measures, and disgrace the cause which we mean to promote. It is easy for us to say, "Come, see my zeal for the LORD," and obvious for us to think, that we are remarkably faithful in his cause; when, in fact, we are inflamed with resentment, impatient of contradiction, seeking our own honour, and doing great harm instead of good. (Notes, Jam. 1:19—21. P. O. 19—27. Notes, and P. O. 3:13—18.) Nay, we may be so zealous against the errors, prejudices, superstitions, and bigotry of others, as to fall into the same evils ourselves; and so to sanction all their calumnies and injuries. How strange is it, that the professed disciples of Christ, who thus decidedly blamed the proposal of calling for fire from heaven to consume their adversaries, should think of kindling fires on earth for that purpose! or of promoting the gospel, and destroying schismatics and heretics, by wars and massacres! "Fire from heaven" might indeed have proved the doctrine to be true, and thus might have in some measure tended to the conviction of opposers: but fire and faggot, can only prove the diabolical malice and cruelty of those who use them; and if the truth itself were supported by such means, it would reasonably become suspected of being from beneath. Yet many, who seem upon the whole to be upright, are led to indulge the same spirit in another way: and their sarcasms and calumnies, against those who differ from them, with other bitter fruits of pride and resentment, too plainly show that "they know not what manner of spirit they are of." Many controversial books, many religious conversations, nay, many sermons, demonstrate to the impartial judge, that very much indeed is wrong in the temper of the parties concerned; though they are not at all aware of it. (Note, Ex. 20:16.) It behooves us therefore to beg of the Lord, that he would convince us of our sin; and that he would rather rebuke and sharply chasten us, than leave us to indulge unchristian tempers; and thus to act contrary both to his precepts, his example, the end of his coming into the world, and the tendency of his holy religion. (P. O. Matt. 18:1—6. Mark 9.30—50.)

V. 57—62. In following Christ, we should count our cost: worldly riches and pleasures cannot reasonably be expected in his service, who, when on earth, "had not where to lay his head:" and in that cause, for which he shed his blood, we should be ready to renounce all secular interests, and to forego even relative comforts and endearments, that we may preach or promote the kingdom of God.—No man is fit for the ministry of the gospel, whose eye and heart are fixed on worldly objects: for he will either leave his work to return to them; or he will neglect it, and do it in an improper manner, by hankering after them. This should be seriously laid to heart by all, who intend to engage in that important service, as well as by those who are already employed in it. Many lay hold of this sacred function, while their affections are fixed upon the riches, honours, and pleasures of the world; nay, while they are scheming to render their ministry itself subservient to the gratification of avarice, ambition, or sensuality! But no one would employ a man to plough his lands, who neglected his work, or performed it in so heedless and unskilful a manner, as these men do their sacred services; as therefore they are not fit for the work of the kingdom of God on earth, they will assuredly not be found meet for the inheritance of the kingdom of God in heaven. (P. O. Matt. 8:14—22.)

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1—12. (Note, 9:1—6.) St. Luke alone records the appointment of the seventy disciples, who in number answered to the elders, which had been constituted by Moses, (Notes, Num. 11:11—30.) and seem to have been intended as assistants to the apostles both at the present, and after our Lord's ascension. Many of the first preachers of the gospel no doubt were of this company: but the traditions on this subject are little to be depended on.—Some expositors conjecture that the evangelist himself was one of them: but this seems altogether unfounded. (Preface to this Gospel.) The seventy disciples were sent forth by two and two, to go, in different circuits, to the several places which Jesus intended to visit; that they might prepare the inhabitants for his reception, as his personal ministry among them would be very short. The instructions given them were nearly the same as those which had been delivered to the apostles. (Marg. Ref. k—q. Notes, Matt. 10:7—18.) As an intimation of the still greater things which would afterwards be wrought among them, he began by repeating an exhortation, which has been already explained. (Marg. Ref. e—i. Note, Matt. 9:36—38.) He also ordered them "to salute no man by the way;" that is, as their time was short and precious, and their work important, they must be altogether intent upon it; and not loiter or trifle, out of a needless regard to ceremony or personal regards. 25 ¶ And, behold, [h]a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, [i]Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?

26 He said unto him, [k]What is written in the law? how readest thou?

27 And he answering said, [l]Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; [m]and thy neighbour as thyself.

28 And he said unto him, [n]Thou hast answered right: [o]this do, and thou shalt live.

29 But he, [p]willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, [q]And who is my neighbour?

To reject an ambassador, or to treat him with contempt, is an affront to the prince who commissioned and sent him, and whom he represents. (Notes, 2 Sam. 10:3,4. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) The apostles and seventy disciples were the ambassadors and representatives of Christ; and they who rejected or despised them, in fact rejected and despised him. Christ himself was the Apostle of his Father, his Ambassador to men, and "the Effulgency of his glory;" so that to reject or despise him, was to reject and despise the Father that sent him. None would despise the apostles, or messengers of Christ, except those who despised him; and they were despised for his sake: nor would any despise Christ, but they who despised the Father who sent him. The Jews "saw and hated both him and his Father." (Notes, 1 Sam. 8:6—9. John 15:17—25.)—The miraculous powers, exercised by these primitive messengers of Christ, rendered their case peculiar: but in every age Jesus "is despised and rejected of men," by the contempt poured on his faithful and exemplary ministers; and in despising him, men show their contempt of God, and their enmity against him.—Despiseth.] Ὁ ἀθετων. 7:30. John 12:48. 1 Cor. 1:19. Gal. 2:21. 3:15. 1 Thes. 4:8. Heb. 10:28. Jude 8. V. 17—20. It does not appear that our Lord expressly promised the seventy disciples the power of casting out unclean spirits. When, therefore, they returned to him, (doubtless at a time and place appointed for them,) they told him with a joyful surprise, that not only diseases, but even devils, had been "subject to them through his name!" Our Lord, however, pointed out far more valuable blessings to be conferred on his disciples. He observed, that "he beheld Satan fall as lightning from heaven." Satan had thus instantaneously been cast down from heaven, on his original apostacy; and his usurped dominion on earth, with the idolatrous worship which he had devised to establish, was about to be thrown down in the same sudden and surprising manner, by means of the gospel preached to the nations; in which work the seventy disciples would in a short time be employed: so that their success, in casting out devils, was only an emblem of a far more decisive victory, which they and their coadjutors and successors would, by his power, obtain over Satan, the ruler of the whole multitude of evil spirits. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, John 12:27—33. 2 Pet. 1:4—9. Rev. 12:7—12.) The circuit which they had made, and the effects which they had witnessed, were only earnests of their future services and successes; for which he, their Lord, promised to qualify them, by giving them "power to tread on serpents and scorpions, &c." to crush the old serpent and his seed, and to withstand the power of every enemy of God and his church: so that neither temptations, afflictions, nor persecutions should eventually hurt them. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Gen. 3:14,15.

Ps. 91:13. Mark 16:17,18. Rom. 16:17—20. Rev. 20:1—3.) Yet they ought not so much to rejoice that evil spirits were subjected to them; but rather that "their names were written in heaven," as the people of God, and the heirs of his kingdom: for many workers of miracles would at last be condemned as wicked men; (Note, Matt. 7:21—23.) but no true believer would come short of eternal life. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Is. 4:3,4. Phil. 4:2,3, v. 3. Heb. 12:22—25, v. 23. Rev. 3:4—6, v. 5. 13:8—10, v. 8. 20:11—15, vv. 12,15.)—It cannot be supposed that Christ meant, by special revelation, to inform all these seventy persons, that they were registered in heaven as heirs of eternal life. In general, however, none can know this of themselves, except by those evidences which prove them to be "born of the Spirit," and truly converted.—'Here Woltzogenius says Christ cast out devils by a virtue residing in himself; his disciples only in the name and by the power of the Lord. Seeing then this power accompanied them into all parts of the world; it is necessary that Christ's presence should be with them every where: now such a presence is a certain indication of the Deity. (1 Kings 8:27. Ps. 139:7. Jer. 23:24. Am. 9:3.) ... Satan being ... spoiled of his dominions, may be said to "fall from heaven," by a phrase familiar both to sacred and profane writers. So of the fall of the king of Babylon the prophet says, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer!" (Is. 14:12.) ... Of the fall of the colleague of Antonius, Cicero says, ... 'Thou hast pulled him down from heaven.' And when Pompey was overthrown, he is said by him, ... to have fallen from the stars.' Whithy.

V. 21, 22. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 11:25—27.) Our Lord inwardly rejoiced with a holy and spiritual joy, in the prospect of the extensive success of the gospel, the salvation of souls, and the glory which would redound to God, both in those events themselves, and by the instruments by which they would be brought to pass. (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.)—No man knoweth who the Son is, &c. (22) 'This seems not to respect what he was to do or suffer, but his nature, excellence, and dignity: as the words following, "who the Father is," respect his nature, his divine excellence and dignity exhibited to us, ... in the person of Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. 4:6.)' Whithy.—'Whosoever seeks the Father without the Son, wandereth out of the way.' Beza.—Rejoiced. (21) Ηγαλλιασατο. 1:47. See on Matt. 5:12.

V. 23, 24. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 13:16,17.) Kings, as well as prophets and righteous persons, had desired to see the promised Messiah, and to hear his doctrine: but they died before he came. David was a prophet, as well as king of Israel: Moses was king in Jeshurun: (Note, Deut. 33:4,5.) and Solomon was one of the inspired writers. (Notes, 24:44—49. Heb. 11:13—16,39,40. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)

V. 25—29. While our Lord was teaching the people, "a certain lawyer," in order to make trial of him, or to ensnare him, asked, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" (Notes, Matt. 19:16—22, v. 16. Mark 10:17—31, v. 17. 12:28—34. Acts 16:29—34, vv. 30,31.) In answer to this question Jesus referred him to the law, which the lawyer professed to study

30 And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, [q]and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.

31 And [r]by chance there came down a certain [s]priest that way; and when he saw him, [t]he passed by on the other side.

32 And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and [u]looked on him, and passed by on the other side.

33 But a certain [v]Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, [w]he had compassion on him, 34 And [x]went to him, and [y]bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to [z]an inn, and took care of him.

35 And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out [a]two pence, and gave them to [b]the host, and said unto him, Take care of him: and [c]whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee.

36 Which now of these three, [d]thinkest thou, [e]was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?

37 And he said, [f]He that showed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, [g]Go and do thou likewise. [Practical Observations.]

38 ¶ Now it came to pass, as they went, that he entered into [h]a certain village: and a certain woman, named Martha, [i]received him into her house.

39 And she had a sister called Mary, [m]which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word.

40 But Martha was [n]cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord, [o]dost thou not care that [p]my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me.

and to teach; and when he had quoted the two precepts, of loving God with "all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength," and "our neighbour as ourselves," (Notes, Lev. 19: 18. Deut. 6:4,5.) Jesus declared that he "had answered right:" that was indeed the sum and substance of the whole law; and if indeed he perfectly kept those two commandments, he would acquire a title to eternal life: but it was also implied, that if he had failed, or should fail, of perfect obedience, he could not possibly obtain life in this way, but must be condemned by the law as a transgressor. (Notes, Ez. 20:11. Matt. 22:34—40. Rom. 3:19,20. Gal. 3:10—14.) Of this he seems to have been aware: and finding himself in danger of being entangled in his own net, yet desiring "to justify himself," he passed by the law of "loving God with all the heart," and inquired, "Who is my neighbour?" For the scribes confined this term to their own nation, sect, friends, and connexions, and did not deem themselves bound to love others at all. (Note, Matt. 19:16—22, v 18.) 'Being confident of his having performed the first part, the duties toward God, by the exact observance of the ceremonies of the law, he made no question concerning that: but for the second, the love of the neighbour, he proposed that other question.' Hammond. Thus he, though a lawyer, "was alive without the law:" (Note, Rom. 7:9—12.) and the wisdom of our Lord's discourse with him, as exactly suited to his case, is still further illustrated. (Note, Prov. 26:4,5.) Thou shalt, &c. (27) This is not exactly either in the words of the Septuagint, or according to the Hebrew text; but completely gives the meaning of both.

V. 30—37. Our Lord did not give the inquirer a direct answer, but stated a case, and led him to answer himself. This has generally been called a parable; but it is related as a fact, and probably was so. It is said that a great number of priests and Levites resided at Jericho, who would frequently journey to Jerusalem and back again; and, as the road lay through a desert, it was greatly infested by robbers. Now a certain man, supposed to be a Jew, being on the road to Jericho, fell into the hands of robbers, who stripped him and wounded him very much, and "left him half dead." While he lay in this deplorable condition, a priest happened to be going on the road; yet neither natural compassion, nor regard to the duties of religion, induced him to assist his countryman, who lay perishing for want of help: but, either pretending urgent business, or fearing lest he too should fall among the thieves, he "passed by on the other side," regardless of his groans and misery. A Levite also, who travelled that way, came indeed and cast a transient look on him, but gave him no help. At length a Samaritan, in his journey, came to the place: and when he saw the poor man's perilous and pitiable case, he forgot his strong national and religious prejudices, as well as the contempt and hatred with which the Jews in general treated the Samaritans. Being moved with compassion, he disregarded the hinderance, trouble, danger, and expense which must be incurred by helping him, he poured the wine and oil, which he carried for his own refreshment, into his bleeding wounds, and bound them up with such linen as he had about him. Having then placed him on the beast on which he rode, he conveyed him to an inn; and there took care of him during the night, as his surgeon and nurse, even as if he had been his friend and brother; and on the morrow, when his business required him to depart, he gave the host what money he could spare, and promised to repay him whatever he should further expend in taking care of him.—Two pence. (35) Or denarii. The circumstance, that the Samaritan could spare only so small a sum, seems an intimation that he was not affluent.—The direct scope of this parable, or narrative, is evidently fixed by the context: it is a beautiful illustration of the law of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," without regard to nation, party, or at other distinction. The Samaritan alone had acted according to the commandment; and the whole was admirably suited to lead the lawyer to understand the subject. Had a Jew been introduced, as thus relieving a distressed Samaritan, prejudice might have prevented the cordial approbation of a bigoted Jew; but his feelings were deeply interested in the case of the Jew, and he could not but allow, that "he who showed mercy on him" was neighbour to him, and fulfilled the duty of that relation. Our Lord then called on him to imitate the Samaritan's conduct; and this conclusion was calculated, by showing him the extent and spirituality of the law, to convince him that he could not, in this way, "inherit eternal life," as well as to direct his subsequent conduct. (Marg. Ref. r—f.) —Some commentators explain this supposed parable almost exclusively of the love of Christ to sinners; but this can be only an instructive accommodation. Man is not only in a pitiable state, as if, contrary to his will and without his fault, he had fallen under the power of Satan; but he is also a condemned criminal, exposed to the righteous vengeance of God, from which Christ alone can deliver him. The priest and the Levite could have helped the man if they would, and were very wicked in omitting to do it; but the law of God is "holy, just, and good," though it leaves the sinner to perish. (Note, Rom. 7:7—12.) At the same time Christ has far outdone the good Samaritan: he came into the world on purpose to save sinners: their rebellions had been committed against him, and they were deserving of his righteous indignation and holy abhorrence: he not only ventured some danger, and incurred some trouble and expense, in rescuing them from deserved destruction; but he impoverished and abased himself, and endured the most excruciating tortures, and the most ignominious death, for that end; and he not only brings them a temporary relief, but perfects their everlasting salvation. (P. O. Gen. 22:13—24. Notes, Rom. 5: 8—10.) In short the blessed Jesus has perfectly fulfilled the law of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," in such circumstances as no other person could be placed in. His conduct therefore is the best interpretation of the commandment, and the best example for our imitation.—Several other accommodations have been made of the subject: "the oil and wine" have been considered as representing the blood and Spirit of Christ, by which our souls are healed; "the inn," his church; "the host," his ministers: and "the two pence," his sacraments: but these fancies are far more amusing than instructive; and it may seriously be apprehended, that by such interpretations, men's thoughts have been very much drawn off from the grand practical inference, "Go, and do thou likewise." (Marg. Ref. h, i. Notes, John 13:12—17. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.)

sister of Lazarus, the following incident occurred. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) As soon as Jesus was sat down, he entered, as usual, on some edifying discourse; and Mary, delighted with the opportunity, "sat at his feet" as an humble disciple to hear his word, and thus to welcome him as her Instructer and Saviour. (Notes, 2:41—52, v. 46. Prov. 8:34. Mark 5:14—20, v. 15. Acts 22:1—5, v. 3.) But Martha, desirous of showing her respect and affection to him in another manner, was aiming to provide a suitable entertainment: so that she was hurried and "cumbered about much serving." Thus she was likely to lose the opportunity of obtaining good to her own soul by our Lord's visit; and she also put herself into an agitation of mind, which was both uncomfortable and sinful. Not being able, however, alone to accomplish her designs, in which she probably too much consulted the credit of her hospitality, she was displeased with her sister for not coming to her assistance. She therefore entered the room in haste: and, with some warmth, appealed to Jesus himself; nay, in some sense expostulated with him, about the supposed impropriety of Mary's conduct; inquiring, whether it gave him no concern to see her sister so inattentive as to leave her to serve alone; and desiring him to direct her to go to her assistance. But the holy and heavenly mind of Christ viewed the case in a far different light: and, addressing Martha, with a tender and compassionate repetition of her name, he observed that she was solicitous and disquieted (as the waters when agitated by a violent storm) "about many things," which were not worth her regard: "but that one thing was needful," which she was at that time led to neglect.—The term needful has reference to some proposed end: many things are needful to the gratification of men's passions; but the end proposed is, in itself, neither needful nor useful: many things are needful to the continuance of our lives on earth, but that may not be needful, or profitable for us. So that the favour of God is the only thing which is absolutely needful to our final happiness; the salvation of Christ is absolutely needful for us sinners, in order to the enjoyment of the favour of God; and an humble, believing, obedient attention to the gospel is absolutely needful, in order to our obtaining an interest in the salvation of Christ. Where this "one thing needful," is properly attended to, all other matters will be used, or pursued in subserviency to it; and whatever may seem to be neglected or lost, by this choice and conduct, present comfort and eternal felicity will be secured.—Our Lord therefore added that "Mary had chosen that good part, which should not be taken from her." (Notes, 16:1—8,19—23. Matt. 13:12.) It was her wise and happy choice to "sit at his feet, and hear his words;" she was not to be seduced into a neglect of his instructions, by any secular cares and encumbrances: and as neither life, death, nor eternity would deprive her of her interest in his salvation; so Christ would by no means consent to her being deprived of the present satisfaction of listening to his discourse, in order to assist in providing a needless plenty and variety, for the refreshment of the bodies, or the indulgence of the appetites, of the company.—Though Martha was on this occasion faulty, yet she was a true believer, and did not in her general conduct neglect "the one thing needful:" we may therefore suppose that this seasonable and affectionate reproof had its proper effect; and that her conduct, when Jesus afterwards came to her house, was regulated by more spiritual and rational considerations. (Notes, John 11:1—46. 12:1—8.) 'Not one dish only to eat of, as Theophylact, and many of the fathers descant here, but the better part, which Mary made it her chief care to labour after.' Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The ministry of the gospel is intended to prepare men to receive Christ, as a Prince and a Saviour; and he will surely come in the power of his Spirit, to all places whither he sends his faithful servants.—The increase of labourers, in this blessed work, should excite us "to pray the Lord of the harvest, to send forth" more and more: for they are very few hitherto compared with the harvest of souls, which shall in due time be gathered in all over the earth; or even in proportion to the extent of the visible church, and the number of mere loiterers or "blind guides," (P. O. Matt. 9:27—38.) At Christ's command we should go forth to preach his gospel, "as lambs among wolves:" depending on his power, we need not fear their rage; and copying his example, we should maintain a meek and blameless conduct, in the midst of injuries and provocations. While we disinterestedly seek the peace and salvation of those to whom we are sent; we may conscientiously "eat and drink such things as are set before us;" for the faithful minister is as justly entitled to a moderate subsistence, as the labourer is to his wages: (Notes 1 Cor. 9:6—18.) yet we should endeavour to requite those who contribute to our support, as well as to promote the success of the gospel, by our prayers and good offices in their behalf. But if our message be obstinately rejected, we ought, in the most decided manner, to bear testimony against the opposers of it, and withdraw from them: and dreadful will be the case of those to whom "the kingdom of God hath come nigh," but who have put it from them with contempt and dislike. In this way, numbers, who have possessed, and been proud of, valuable privileges and distinctions, will be "thrust down into hell;" with more terrible vengeance, than the inhabitants of Tyre, or even of Sodom; for these did not continue impenitent under such abundant means of grace. Nor let any imagine that this only will be verified in those who were favoured with the ministry of Christ and his apostles, and rejected it; for it is still true of all the faithful preachers of the gospel, that "he who heareth them heareth Christ; and he who despiseth them, despiseth Christ, and... the Father who sent him." (P. O. Matt. 10:7—33. 11:16—24.)

V. 17—24. Pious and zealous ministers, when evidently made useful, disregard their toil and hardship; and return from preaching the word, to meet their gracious Lord in retirement, with joy and gratitude.—We may be sure that he will always rather exceed his promise than fall short of it, to all who go forth depending on his help, and observing his directions. As he "was manifested to destroy the works of the devil," and as, in consequence of his death upon the cross, he foresaw that adversary "falling as lightning from heaven;" so we may labour and pray, in hope, for the pulling down of his kingdom of ignorance, infidelity, impiety, and vice, all over the earth, through the preaching of the gospel, and by the power of our exalted Redeemer. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Relying on him, we may expect to trample under foot the most potent and malignant enemies, who are like serpents and scorpions, and to have Satan himself "bruised under our feet shortly;" nor can any adversary by any means hurt those whom Jesus employs, protects, and prospers. But, though we should be thankful for gifts and usefulness, yet we should chiefly seek the assurance of our "names being written in heaven," that we may have a solid ground of rejoicing: for it would be far better to be the most obscure believer, than to have all knowledge, eloquence, and even success in preaching the gospel, and at length to prove "a cast-away." Let us then beware especially of spiritual pride: by this sin, Satan "fell like lightning from heaven," and from a bright archangel became a hateful and miserable fiend: (Note, 1 Tim. 3:6.) pride has been the forerunner of destruction to many, who "have prophesied, wrought miracles, and cast out devils in the name of Christ;" and of many, who for a time have preached with great popularity, and apparent success: and it has tarnished the lustre and terminated the usefulness of others, concerning whose final state better hopes may be entertained. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:1—6. P. O. 1—10.)—The Lord Jesus "rejoiced in spirit," that it pleased the Father to hide his "mysteries from the wise and prudent, and to reveal them unto babes;" and he has at all times "resisted the proud, and given his grace unto the humble." The more simply dependent we therefore are on the teaching, help, and blessing of the Son of God, the more we shall know both of the Father and of the Son; (Notes, John 17:1—3. 1 John 2:20—25.) the more blessed we shall be in seeing the glory, and hearing the words, of the divine Saviour; and the more useful we shall be made in promoting his cause. (P. O. Matt. 11:25—30.)

V. 25—29. Good questions may be proposed from very base motives: yet we ought seriously to inquire, "What shall we do to inherit eternal life?" And nothing should be counted difficult or perilous, where such a prize is at stake: especially as it is connected with the awful alternative of everlasting punishment. In answer to this inquiry the blessed Saviour will direct us to the written word, and demand of us, "How readest thou?" Yet the holy law itself cannot answer the question, How a sinner may inherit eternal life? It is, however, proper for those "who desire to be under the law, to hear the law:" and when its extensive, spiritual, and reasonable requirements are fully and scripturally stated, we may safely assure any inquirer, that if he do this he shall live. Indeed the most perfect obedience for the time to come would not discharge any part of the debt which we have already contracted: yet we know, that no man will ever perform this condition, or be able to claim eternal life, even on this ground; nay, no one will ever love God and his neighbour with any measure of pure spiritual love, who is not made partaker of regenerating grace; which invariably produces humiliation for sin, and simplicity of dependence on the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus. But the proud heart of man strives earnestly against these mortifying convictions: and every ray of light that breaks in upon the conscience, excites men to other and further endeavours "to justify themselves," even as the approach of danger stirs us up to provide for our own defence. (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.) As the na

CHAPTER XI.

Jesus teaches his disciples to pray, and encourages earnestness and importunity by two illustrations, 1—13. He casts out a devil, and exposes the cowardly and malice of those who ascribed the miracle to the power of Beelzebub, 14—23. He shows the blessedness of true piety above all external privileges; and warns the impenitent Jews, 27—36. Dining with a Pharisee, he exposes the ignorance, hypocrisy, and wickedness of the scribes and Pharisees, 37—52; who eagerly endeavour to ensnare and accuse him, 53, 54.

AND it came to pass, [a]that as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, [b]teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.

2 And he said unto them, [c]When ye pray, say, [d]Our Father, [e]which art in heaven, [f]Hallowed be thy name. [g]Thy kingdom come. [h]Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth.

3 [i]Give us [*]day by day our daily bread.

4 And [k]forgive us our sins; [l]for we also forgive ture and effects of the love of God are most out of the way of carnal men, they elude conviction on that account; provided they can flatter themselves that they have not been injurious to their neighbours. Leaving out therefore "the first and great commandment," as if it were actually repealed; or supposing that they satisfy its requirements by "a form of godliness;" they endeavour "to justify themselves" in respect of the "second, which is like unto it:" and learned scribes, ancient and modern, come in to their aid, with a variety of corrupt glosses, perplexing criticisms, and frivolous distinctions, before which the meaning and spirit of the precept seem to evaporate. Thus the most flagrant injustice, treachery, oppression, and inhumanity, are openly vindicated as consistent with the law of God! Nay, the Scripture is ransacked, and quoted for precedents and arguments, in favour of the most horrid cruelties which rapacious avarice, malignity, bigotry, or ambition can perpetrate! Some difference of climate, or colour, or religious tenets, is pleaded; as if this bounded the divine command, and excused us for not loving a vast majority of the human species as our neighbours! Or some judicial regulation, made to prevent the fatal effects of that hardness of heart, which no law can change; or some practices, evidently originating from human selfishness, are adduced, as if they actually repealed the laws of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," and "of doing to others, as we would they should do unto us." Thus men "render the commandments of God of none effect, by their traditions" and corrupt reasonings; and human learning, nay, what is called theology, often rivets those prejudices, which are equally subversive of the law of love, and of the gospel of free grace. We must, however, endeavour by every means to counteract the effects of such destructive errors: and in order to this, apt illustrations, and appeals to the heart and conscience, may be more useful than abstracted reasonings: and though we must not countenance any corrupt prejudices, yet on many occasions it is advisable to oppose them indirectly, and to study by what avenue we may best find access to the heart.

V. 30—37. It is most lamentable to observe, to what a degree selfishness pervades all ranks and orders of men; and how many excuses they devise, that they may avoid incurring trouble or expense, in relieving the miseries of others. They plead that they are in haste, that their business is urgent or sacred, that the attempt is vain or perilous, that they have it not in their power, that others may do it to greater advantage, that it does not properly belong to them, or that "the time is not come." With such pretences great multitudes pass by the wretched and perishing, and avoid looking on them, that they may be excused from assisting them: especially the countless millions all over the world, who are "perishing for lack of knowledge." Others will give those in urgent misery or danger a transient look and a pitying word, hoping some good Christian will come to their relief, though they cannot get time, or are not able to do it. Alas! that many professors and ministers of the gospel are as evidently selfish and unfeeling as any other men! and thus they give up their holy faith and sacred function to the contempt and invectives of infidels; who substitute a proud semblance of benevolence in the place of repentance, faith in a divine Saviour, love to God, and to man for his sake. The true Christian, however, has the law of love written in his heart: the Spirit of Christ dwells in him, and his image is renewed on his soul: misery will therefore uniformly excite compassion in his breast, wherever it is seen, though in a stranger, an enemy, or one of an opposite sect or party. Thus the Son of God looked down, with compassion, on our deserved and helpless misery, and came to our relief; though he knew that it would expose him to the deepest abasement, and most intense sufferings, to deliver us: thus he is ever ready to pity and help the poor sinner, when stripped of every plea, wounded in his conscience, and without hope of deliverance from any other quarter. In our utmost distress he has come to us, to bind up our broken hearts, to pour his healing balm into our bleeding wounds, and to preserve us from that destruction, into which our enemies had plunged us: by his power and grace he brings us into his church, and there takes care of us and heals our souls; and he requires his ministers and people, to show their love to him, by their attention to the weak and discouraged of his flock; (Note, John 21:15—17.) assuring them of an abundant recompense at his return to judge the world. After this interesting and endearing example of inexpressible love, to which we owe all our hopes and comforts; every true believer must and will pity and endeavour to relieve the oppressed, and to comfort the wretched; he will be induced to venture loss, danger, and reproach, in this work and labour of love: the excuses which satisfy others, and which once satisfied him, will no longer be admitted: he will become the good Samaritan to the poor and afflicted, the ignorant and ungodly, of every name and nation, who come in his way: yea, he will go out of his way to meet with and relieve them, as he has ability and opportunity. And when he considers that Jesus loved him and bled for him, when an enemy and a rebel: and, having shown him mercy, that he has commanded him "to go and do likewise;" he will love, and do good to, even his enemies, and to the vilest of mankind, for Christ's sake. With this view of Christianity before our eyes, have we reason to expect that any who profess it will defraud, oppress, enslave, or persecute any of the human race? If there be an appearance of such practises in some who seem to be Christians, we must either allow that they are not what they profess to be, or that they "know not what manner of spirit they are of." And can we but wonder, that professed Christians should discourage, oppose, or "forbid us to preach the gospel to the gentiles," and to the Jews "that they may be saved?" (Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 10:12—17. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.)

V. 38—42. Let us follow Christ, especially in his persevering love to sinners; let us welcome him into our hearts, and his disciples and ministers into our houses: and let the latter especially be careful to improve the hours of social intercourse in edifying discourse. But we should have more profit in meeting together, as well as larger ability in imitating the good Samaritan, if we were not so "cumbered about much serving." Alas! what time is wasted, and what expenses are incurred, even in the entertainment of the ministers and professors of the gospel, to feast the guests, and to gratify the vanity of those who furnish the repast; while a scanty surplus remains for the poor, and a small proportion of the opportunity for religious improvement! (Note, 14:12—14.) Nay, sometimes the persons concerned thus lose their temper also; and are even induced to violate the sabbath, and to constrain their servants to neglect the public ordinances of God, and perhaps to do the same themselves! If the gracious Saviour were personally present on such occasions, and saw his professed disciples thus "careful and troubled about many things;" would he not rebuke them far more sharply than he did Martha? Indeed the delinquents will attempt to vindicate their conduct; and perhaps may be angry, and affect to censure those who are indifferent to external accommodations, compared with "sitting at Christ's feet, and hearing his word:" but he will decide the matter against them, and not admit of their plea that these are little things; much less will he consider such cares and encumbrances as needful.—But it is not in this way alone, that we are apt to be "careful and troubled about many things." Numbers are wholly given up to a variety of worldly pursuits and anxieties, to the entire neglect of their souls: and there are none of us, who do not at some times expose ourselves to the rebuke of Christ, for our disproportionate solicitude and eagerness about mere trifles, when compared with our attention to the great concerns of eternity. Let us then mind more diligently and entirely, "the one thing needful." 'None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good:' to hear, believe, and obey his gospel, and to have him for our "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption," comprises all that is necessary for this world and the next: and without this all the rest will leave us for ever miserable. This good part is by the gospel proposed to our choice: happy then are they who give it a decided preference to all earthly objects; for it "shall not be taken from them," through the countless ages of eternity: and to those who choose and seek it in the first place, all things else which can conduce to their present comfort, or their everlasting felicity, shall assuredly be added. (Notes, Matt. 6:25—34.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1—4. Our Lord, it may be supposed, constantly prayed with his disciples, when they were retired together. On one of these occasions, a certain person (perhaps one of the seventy disciples, who might not have heard the sermon on the mount) entreated him to teach them to pray, as John had taught his followers. Probably, John had added to his general instructions on this subject, some comprehensive directory, or form of prayer; which both served to distinguish his disciples from those of the Pharisees every one that is indebted to us. And [m]lead us not into temptation; [n]but deliver us from evil.

5 And he said unto them, [o]Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves;

6 For a friend of mine [p]in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?

7 And he from within shall answer and say, [q]Trouble me not: [r]the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee.

8 I say unto you, Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend; yet [s]because of his importunity, he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.

9 And [t]I say unto you, [u]Ask, and it shall be given you; [v]seek, and ye shall find; [w]knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

10 For [x]every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened.

11 If [y]a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent?

12 Or if he shall ask an egg, will he [z]offer him [a]a scorpion?

13 If ye then [b]being evil, [c]know how to give good gifts unto your children; [d]how much more shall your [e]heavenly Father [f]give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? [Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ And he was [g]casting out a devil, and it was dumb. And it came to pass, when the devil was gone out, the dumb spake; and the people wondered.

15 But some of them said, He casteth out devils through [h]Beelzebub the chief of the devils.

16 And others, [i]tempting him, sought of him a sign from heaven.

17 But he, [k]knowing their thoughts, said unto them, [l]Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and a house divided against a house, falleth.

18 If [m]Satan also be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? because [n]ye say that I cast out devils through Beelzebub.

19 And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, [o]by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore [p]shall they be your judges.

20 But if I with [q]the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt, [r]the kingdom of God is come upon you.

21 When [s]a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace:

22 But [t]when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils.

23 He [u]that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth.

24 When [x]the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, [y]he walketh through [z]dry places, [a]seeking rest: and finding none, he saith, [b]I will return unto my house whence I came out.

25 And when he cometh, [c]he findeth it swept and garnished.

26 Then goeth he, and taketh to him seven other spirits [d]more wicked than himself; and they enter in, and dwell there: [e]and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

and to impress upon their minds the important truths which he had inculcated, concerning the Messiah and the spiritual blessings of his kingdom; and thus to regulate their judgment and devotions at the same time. This disciple, therefore, desired Jesus to instruct him and the other disciples to pray, by some similar method: for we cannot suppose, but that he had in general taught them both what to pray for, and in what manner to pray, by his doctrine and daily example. In answer to his request, our Lord again delivered that prayer, which has been fully considered. (Notes, Matt. 6:7—13.) The variations are immaterial, except the omission of the concluding doxology.—Instead of "this day," we here read, "day by day," or daily; and sins is substituted for debts. (4) But the clause, "When ye pray, say," at least warrants the frequent use of the very words here prescribed, which certainly imply every thing that we can ask for ourselves or others, in respect of this life, and of that which is to come. (Marg. Ref.)—Thy will be done, &c. (2) To pray, that "the will of God may be done, as in heaven, so on earth," is widely different from saying, in submission to Providence, in some special instance, "The will of the Lord be done:" (22: 42. Acts 21:14.) for the former takes in obedience to the will of God, as a lawgiver, and as a Saviour, as well as submission to his providential appointments. (Notes, Matt. 6:10. 7:21—23.)—Indebted, &c. (4) 'It is carefully to be observed, for the due stating of the controversy of Christ's satisfaction, that sins are not strictly and properly compared to debts; seeing, by sinning we do not so properly contract a debt as a guilt, and obnoxiousness to punishment; which two things will admit these differences: (1) That, if another will pay my debt, the creditor cannot justly refuse his paying it for me, or complain that he is not satisfied when the whole debt is paid: but let another be never so willing to suffer for my offence he can make no satisfaction for it, unless the judge be willing to admit him to suffer in my stead. Hence, (2) the creditor does no act of grace, by admitting the solution of another: and if that other pay the whole, he can require no conditions for my discharge. But the ruler against whose laws I have personally offended, does me an act of grace, in admitting another to suffer in my stead; and so may do this only upon some reasonable conditions.' Whitby.

V. 5—13. In addition to this comprehensive form of prayer, our Lord encouraged the disciples to be persevering and earnest in their requests, so as to take no denial; the happy effects of which he illustrated by a case, which might occur to them. In those hot countries, it is common, where it can be done safely, to travel in the cool of the evening, and the first hours of the night. Should an unexpected guest, therefore, from his journey, come at midnight to the house of one wholly unprepared for entertaining him: the person thus visited would apply to a friend or neighbour to assist him in affording the weary traveller some refreshment. And though his friend might attempt to put him off, and excuse himself; yet, if he were not easily denied, (as it might be supposed, he would not,) but urged the request with an importunity which in other circumstances would be reprehensible; he would seldom fail, in the event, to overcome the reluctancy of his friend. If then importunity proved so successful with men, notwithstanding their selfishness, and the inconvenience which attends granting a request made at a late hour; how much more will it prevail with God, who delights in mercy, who deems no time unseasonable, who answers every prayer with most perfect ease, and who only delays his favours, in order to make men more earnest and persevering in their supplications! (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, 18:1—8. Gen. 32:24—30.) This illustration our Lord concluded by repeating such exhortations and promises, as have already been considered: (Marg. Ref. s—e. Note, Matt. 7:7—11.) except that, instead of "good things," he here inserts "the Holy Spirit;" by which it is intimated, that this gift to us sinners, since the work of redemption was completed, is the sum or earnest of all good things: for by his influences, we are brought to know God and ourselves, to repent, to believe in and love Christ, to hope, rejoice, and obey; and so are made comfortable and useful in this world, and meet for happiness in the next. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, John 16:7—15.) The gift of the Holy Spirit is two-fold: his immediate inspiration made men prophets; his regenerating and sanctifying influences render men saints, or holy persons. No sober man can suppose that every one who prays for the Holy Spirit, will be made a prophet, or enabled to work miracles. His renewing, enlightening, sanctifying, and comforting influences are no doubt exclusively intended. (Notes, John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.)

Importunity. (8) Την αναιδειαν. priv. et αιδως, pudor: sine pudore. 'Qui moleste urget, nec ullo responso aut alio modo abigi potest.' Schleusner.—'According to that saying of the Jews, the impudent man overcomes the modest and the bashful, how much more God who is goodness itself.' Whitby.—Heavenly, &c. (13) Εξ ουρανου.—Εν τοις ουρανοις, Matt. 7:11.

27 ¶ And it came to pass, as he spake these things, a certain woman of the company lifted up her voice, and said unto him, [f] Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked.

28 But he said, [g]Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.

29 ¶ And [h]when the people were gathered thick together, he began to say, [i]This is an evil generation; [k]they seek a sign, and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet.

30 For [l]as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation.

31 The [m]queen of the south shall [n]rise up in the judgment with the men of this generation, and condemn them: for she came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, [o]a greater than Solomon is here.

32 The [p]men of Nineveh shall rise up in the judgment with his generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, [q]a greater than Jonas is here.

33 No man, [r]when he hath lighted a candle, putteth it in a secret place, neither under [s]a bushel, but on a candlestick, that they which come in [t]may see the light.

34 The [u]light of the body is the eye: therefore when thine eye is [v]single, thy whole body also is full of light; [x]but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness.

35 Take [y]heed therefore that the light which is in thee be not darkness.

36 If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, [z]the whole shall be full of light, as when [a]the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light. [Practical Observations.]

37 ¶ And as he spake, [b]a certain Pharisee besought him to dine with him: and he went in, and sat down to meat.

38 And when the Pharisee saw it, [c]he marvelled that he had not first washed before dinner.

39 And the Lord said unto him, [d]Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter; [e]but your inward part is full of [f]ravening and wickedness.

40 Ye [g]fools! [h]did not he that made that which is without, make that which is within also?

41 But [i]rather give alms [k]of such things as ye have, and, behold, [l]all things are clean unto you.

(21) The circumstances of the "strong man's being armed," (namely, with the sinner's ignorance, error, prejudices, pride, and lusts,) the confidence which he places in this armour, and the peace in which he retains his possession, till overcome by one "stronger than he," are here added to the parable: and the contrast between "the strong one," and one "stronger than he," is marked emphatically. V. 27, 28. The power and beneficence of Christ's miracles, the authority and excellence of his doctrine, the holiness of his character, and the wisdom of his answers to his malicious enemies, seem to have combined so to fill this woman with admiration, that she could not refrain from crying aloud, that the woman, who had the honour of being his mother, must be peculiarly happy above all others. The answer of our Lord to this, was exactly to the same effect with one on another occasion, which has already been considered. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 12:46—50.) ' The blessedness of my mother ariseth not from this, that she conceived me, and brought me forth into the world: but in order to that, it is necessary for her, as well as others, to believe and obey my word. V. 33—36. This was an answer to another cavil, connected with the preceding objection. (16) The substance of it has been already commented upon: but the allusion to the light and the eye, seems here to be applied in a different manner, than elsewhere. (Notes, Matt. 5:14—16. 6:22, 23. Mark 4:21, 22.) Our Lord intimated by it, that he should proceed to diffuse the light of his truth, notwithstanding the perverse opposition of the Pharisees; nor would they be able to cover or extinguish that light, which he had kindled for the benefit of mankind. Yet the Pharisees, and others of similar character, would remain in darkness, through the prejudices of their wicked hearts; even as men whose eyes are diseased, see nothing, or nothing as it really is, in the clearest light. It therefore concerned every hearer to be peculiarly careful, that the supposed light, which he followed, was not darkness; or his first principles and practical judgment erroneous. For, as the body is furnished with light for its direction by the eye; so the mind is guided in every operation by the practical judgment: if then their minds were well prepared to receive the benefit of revelation, they would have no more occasion to demand further information; than a man with good eyes is at a loss to distinguish the surrounding objects, "when the bright shining of a candle doth give him light." (Marg. Ref.)—This last verse may be thus understood: "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark; the whole" (of thy conduct, or, path.) "shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light."—' A mind thus enlightened, and free from all those distempers which darken and make blind the soul, will direct all our faculties and inclinations, and all the actions of the life aright; as a light doth the body, when it walks in a dark night.' Whitby.

V. 37, 38. As Jesus was speaking on some other occasion, (for harmonists seem, with probability, to place the following incident in another connexion,) a Pharisee, with apparent respect and earnestness, pressed him to dine with him, and he was pleased to accept of the invitation; yet it is probable, that the Pharisee had purposely collected together many of his brethren to meet Jesus, with a design to ensnare him, of which he was fully aware. This may account for the remarkable sharpness of his reproofs and warnings. (Notes, 7:36. 14:1—6.)—The Pharisee, however, expressed his surprise that Jesus had not first washed according to their traditions; (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Matt. 15:1, 2. Mark 7:3—8.) and this gave him the opportunity of exposing and condemning their hypocrisy and superstition. (Note, Matt. 23:23, 24.)

"Had not been baptized."—If the verb βαπτιζω means exclusively to immerse; certainly all the company, except Jesus and his disciples, had openly been immersed, and were daily immersed, before dinner; so that it was a matter of astonishment, that our Lord should not be thus immersed.

V. 39, 40. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 12:33—37. 23:25—28.) As God, who created the soul, and perfectly knows it, abhors all sin, and requires especially inward purity; nothing can be more irrational and foolish, than to suppose that any external observances can please him, while avarice, pride and ambition, revenge and other malignant passions, or sensual lusts possess the heart.

V. 41. (Notes, Is. 58:3—12. Dan. 4:27. Matt. 5:7. 25:34—40.) Pilate washed his hands, as a token that he was pure from the blood of Jesus, when he gave him up to be crucified 42 But [k]wo unto you, Pharisees! [l]for ye tithe mint and rue, and all manner of herbs, [m]and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, [n]and not to leave the other undone.

43 Wo unto you, Pharisees! [o]for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets.

44 Wo unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! [p]for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them.

45 Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying [q]thou reproachest us also.

46 And he said, [r]Wo unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.

47 Wo unto you! [s]for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them.

48 Truly [t]ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: [u]for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres.

49 Therefore also said [x]the Wisdom of God, [y]I will send them prophets and apostles, [z]and some of them they shall slay and persecute;

50 That [a]the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of [b]this generation;

51 From [c]the blood of Abel, unto the blood of [d]Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily I say unto you, It shall be required of this generation.

52 Wo unto you, lawyers! [e]for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye [f]hindered.

53 And as he said these things unto them, the scribes and the Pharisees began [f]to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him [g]to speak of many things, 54 Laying wait for him, and [h]seeking to catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him.

and the Pharisees washed their hands, as a profession of holiness and piety, while their hearts were full of rapacity and iniquity. (Note, Matt..27:24,25.) But the observance in both cases was vain and inefficacious: and the conduct of Zaccheus, who, having made large restitution to all whom he had wronged, gave half of his remaining goods to the poor, was a far better proof of love to God and man, as well as of sincere repentance and faith; and a far better method of seeking the sanctified and comfortable use of outward things. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 3:10—14. 19:1—10.)—Some think our Lord meant, that, as the possessions of many among the Pharisees had been in great measure acquired by oppression and injustice; and as it would have been impracticable, in all cases, to make restitution to the injured persons; they must dispose of all their ill-gotten and idolized property in alms, before they could expect that God would accept their services, and bless their provisions: and the original expression, with the connexion, and the character of the persons addressed, give considerable probability to this interpretation. Liberality to the poor, however, according to a man's ability, from proper principles, does more towards rendering outward possessions or enjoyments sanctified, than any ceremonial washings can do. Where this is duly attended to, from scriptural motives, and men deduct from their own indulgence to give a portion to their poor neighbours, "Behold, all things are clean unto them."

In the parallel passage of St. Matthew, which was spoken at the close of his ministry, our Lord evidently spoke in his own person.

(Notes, Acts 4:1—22, v. 17—40.)—'For a long season they, who ought to have been the doorkeepers of the church, have been the chief persons in driving away the people from the knowledge of God.' Beza.

V. 53, 54. It is no wonder, that these sharp reproofs extremely enraged the hypocritical scribes and Pharisees; especially as Jesus was guest to a Pharisee, when he thus spake to them: they therefore set on him, all at once, to put him off his guard, with a variety of questions or objections, that he might say something, which should give them matter of accusation against him.—Several of the original words are taken from hunting; which is an apt emblem of the vehemence, and rudeness, and artful devices, with which the company sought to entangle Jesus in their nets and toils. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. It is a most valuable effect of preventing grace and mercy, to be made so sensible of our indigence, and our dependence on God, as heartily to desire to pray; and so aware of our own ignorance, and of the difficulty of praying aright, as explicitly to seek for instruction in this most important concern. When we are thus led to beseech the Lord Jesus to teach us to pray, we use a very proper introduction to all our subsequent devotions; but he will do it in a manner far superior to that of John, or any other of his servants. He will lead us into an acquaintance with our own wants, and the promises of God, and excite in our hearts correspondent desires and affections; and thus he will teach us to pray in humility, reverence, faith, expectation, and earnest importunity: he will give us "the Spirit of adoption," that we may come with confidence to God, as "our Father who is in heaven;" and from love to him and zeal for his glory, as well as from "good-will to men," to pray "that his name may be hallowed, his kingdom" enlarged to all regions, "and his will done," his commands unreservedly obeyed, and his dispensations cheerfully submitted to, "on earth as in heaven." From submission to his will, moderation in our desires, and reliance

CHAPTER XII.

Jesus warns his disciples against hypocrisy; and the fear of man in confessing him. He shows the danger of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and teaches dependence on him, 1—12. He refuses to act as judge in temporal things; and warns his disciples against covetousness, by the parable of a rich man, suddenly torn by death from all his purposed and expected enjoyments, 13—21. He cautions them against anxious cares, and exhorts them to seek spiritual blessings, 22—34, and to be always ready for the coming of their Lord, 35—40. He instructs and warns his ministers, by the parable of a faithful, and of a wicked steward, 41—48. He predicts the divisions which his gospel would occasion, 49—53; reproves those who knew not the signs of the times, 54—56; and counsels the people to seek reconciliation to God without delay, 57—59.

IN the mean time, when there were gathered together [a]an innumerable multitude of people, insomuch that they [b]trode one upon another, he began to say unto his disciples [c]first of all, [d]Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, [e]which is hypocrisy.

2 For [f]there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known.

3 Therefore [g]whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness, shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets, shall be proclaimed upon the [h]house-tops.

on his providence, we shall thus learn to live willingly dependent on him, "day by day, for our daily bread." We shall, under this instruction, seek continually for the "pardon of our sins, and learn to forgive every one who is indebted to us;" and from abhorrence of iniquity, as well as from dread of its consequences, we shall, in humble consciousness of our own weakness, pray "not to be led into temptation, but to be delivered from evil;" from the evil one, from the evil of this world, and from the evil of our own hearts, that we may be made holy as our God is holy, and be prepared for perfect felicity in his favour and presence for ever. (P. O. Matt. 6:9—18.) The teaching of Christ will also encourage and enlarge our hopes. Assured that we are praying for such things as are good for us; we shall persevere, and be importunate, though we seem to meet with a repulse; being satisfied, that "every one that asketh receiveth." We shall therefore return again and again to the throne of grace, even when we have been baffled by temptation, or proved by delays; and renew and increase our earnestness in asking, seeking, and knocking; especially that we may obtain the Holy Spirit, to enlighten, sanctify, strengthen, and comfort our hearts; and to put us in full possession of the salvation of Christ. (Note, John 4:10—15.) All these blessings our heavenly Father is far more ready to bestow on "every one who asketh for them," than any indulgent father can be to give food to his hungry child; and, in this way, we need no more fear being fatally deluded, or finally overcome by our enemy, than a beloved child needs fear lest his father "should give him a scorpion instead of an egg:" nay, this would be far more likely; because men without exception are evil by nature; and that depravity often triumphs over even natural affection; but "God is Love," and "delighteth in mercy." (Note, Is. 49:14—16.)

V. 14—36. The goodness of God, in all its varied displays, tends to draw forth man's ingratitude and enmity as far as he is left to himself. Even when divine love was incarnate for the salvation of sinners, his continued and persevering kindness, and pre-eminent excellency, excited the utmost envy and malignity in those persons, whose hypocrisy he exposed, whose selfishness he shamed, and with whose credit, interest, or authority, his doctrine interfered: nay, they ascribed even his most beneficent miracles to diabolical agency! But the tendency of his gospel to humble piety, purity, equity, truth, and love, did then, and does still, confute such blasphemous slanders; and it is even now in a measure accompanied with "the finger of God," to change the willing slaves of Satan into the devoted worshippers and servants of JEHOVAH. As the conversion of a sinner breaks that false peace which existed in his heart and conscience, whilst the devil reigned there with undisturbed sway, and two conflicting parties are formed within the soul, of which grace is superior and will obtain the complete victory: (Note, Gal. 5:16—18.) so the strange indifference of men to the concerns of religion is disturbed wherever the gospel is successfully preached; and two parties are formed, the one for Christ and his cause, and the other in opposition to them; but the former will certainly prevail at length. (Notes, 12:49—53. Matt. 10:34—36. P. O. Acts 14:1—10.) In this contest, none are allowed to stand neuter: the Lord Jesus calls on every one to join him in destroying the kingdom of Satan; "he that is not for him is against him, and he that gathereth not with him scattereth." Yet we must not hastily conclude, that all who appear to be for him, will "continue to the end." Alas! the unclean spirit for a time goes out of many, who never admit the Saviour to take possession of their hearts: and so the enemy returns to his habitation, and "the last state of those men becomes worse than the first." From such a dreadful event, (may every one say,) Good Lord, deliver us!" (P. O. Matt. 12:22—50.)—In order to this, we should endeavour to "hear the word of God, and keep it" by faith and love in our hearts, and by obedience in our lives. Without this we cannot be blessed: for all notions, forms, and outward privileges, which fail of rectifying men's dispositions and regulating their conduct, will lead to their deeper condemnation. Thus multitudes who hear the gospel are proved to be "an evil generation:" they stand out in unbelief against every demonstration of the truth, and continue in sin against the convictions of their own consciences: while many come from distant places through love to the word of God, and bestow great pains under immense disadvantages to become wise unto salvation; and others profit by far inferior means and instruments, who "will rise up in judgment against them and condemn them."—But were Christ himself the constant Preacher to any company, and did he daily work his miracles of love among them; unless his grace also humbled their hearts, and subdued their carnal prejudices, they would not be profited. Instead, therefore, of requiring more evidence and fuller instruction, than the Lord is pleased to afford us; we should "pray without ceasing," that our understandings may be opened, and our hearts prepared, to profit by the light which we enjoy: and above all things we ought to take heed that the "light which is in us be not darkness;" for if our leading principles be fallacies, and our affections carnal, our judgment and practice must become more egregiously wrong by all our reasonings and assiduity.

V. 37—54. The case of these Pharisees and lawyers is an awful but instructive example. Their ambitious desire of pre-eminence, applause, and authority, and their proud and worldly prejudices, led them to place religion in minute but specious observances: this seduced them from the spiritual truth, will, and worship of God, and entangled them more and more in superstition and delusion. They gravely marvelled that Jesus washed not before dinner; yet they did not attempt to cleanse their own hearts from ravening and wickedness; foolishly forgetting, that "he who made that which is without, made that which is within also!" They fancied that external and uncommanded purifications would sanctify their meals; whilst the demands of justice and charity, as well as the duties of piety, were neglected. That they might appear singularly conscientious, and pay court to the priests, who doubtless flattered them in return, they scrupulously tithed even their garden herbs; but at the same time "they passed over judgment and the love of God." Thus they were exposed to the sharp rebukes of Christ, and engaged in opposition to him: and, with all their sanctimonious gravity and austerity, they became his persecutors and murderers, and fell under his most tremendous indignation, till "vengeance came upon them to the uttermost." Alas! they have had many successors, who have proved themselves to be their children, even as they were proved to be "the children of those who slew the prophets;" for their conduct has evinced, that the honour which they affected to render to the memory of deceased saints and martyrs, seemed rather intended for their murderers, than for them.—Proud men deem the word of God to be a reproach to them: many would allow the preacher to be severe upon the crimes of others, provided he would be gentle to their's; and among learned men, haughty ecclesiastics, and false professors of the gospel, numbers seem to think, that their characters even sanctify their crimes; so that it is often thought intolerable insolence, for a minister to expose their most flagrant enormities. But the reproach comes from their own consciences; and we must by no means connive at their vices, which are dishonourable to God and ruinous to men, in proportion to the eminence or sacredness of their characters: and when renowned or authorized teachers perplex the truth by their subtleties, and set the people against it by their influence, they become murderers of men's souls and ought most carefully to be avoided, and decidedly protested against. "Wo unto them! for they take away the key of knowledge; they enter not in themselves, and those who are entering in they hinder:" and they are the more dangerous for being "as graves that appear not, of which the men who walk over them are not aware." But such truths must excite opposition, and many will vehemently urge those who openly declare them, to speak or do something which may give them a handle against them. Such persons therefore as engage in contests of this kind, should be of a blameless conversation, and endued with heavenly wisdom; they should also have a clear call, and a great command of their own temper and spirit: so that few are qualified for these services. But we should all look well to our own hearts, that they may be cleansed and new created: and, while we insist on the great things of the law and of the gospel, we must be careful not to neglect even the smallest matter which God has appointed.—Finally, the more careful we are "to give alms of such things as we have," and to deduct from every article of expense for that purpose, the more comfortable, pure, and holy will all our possessions and enjoyments be. (P. O. Matt. 23:13—39.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1—7. While Jesus was speaking to the scribes and Pharisees within the house, an immense multitude collected together without; so that they afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do.

5 But I will [1]forewarn you whom ye shall fear: [m]Fear him, which after he hath killed, hath [n]power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, Fear him.

6 Are not [o]five sparrows sold for two farthings? [p]and not one of them is forgotten before God.

7 But [q]even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore: [r]ye are of more value than many sparrows.

8 Also I say unto you, [s]Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also [t]confess before the angels of God.

9 But [u]he that denieth me before men, [x]shall be denied before the angels of God.

10 And [y]whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven.

11 And [z]when they bring you unto the synagogues, and unto magistrates and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say:

12 For [a]the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say. [Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And one of the company said unto him, [b]Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me.

14 And he said unto him, [c]Man, [d]who made me a judge or a divider over you?

15 And he said unto them, [e]Take heed, and beware of covetousness: [f]for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

16 And he spake a parable unto them, saying, [g]The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully.

17 And he thought within himself, saying, [h]What [i]shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?

18 And he said, [k]This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods.

19 And I will say to my soul, [l]Soul, thou hast much goods laid up [m]for many years; [n]take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.

20 But [o]God said unto him, [p]Thou fool, this night [q]thy soul shall be required of thee: [r]then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?

21 So is [s]he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not [t]rich toward God. [Practical Observations.] even trampled upon one another, in endeavouring to get near him. The people must have come from very distant places: and our Lord seems to have left the Pharisee's house, and to have spoken the subsequent instructions to his disciples, in the hearing of the multitude, yet in the presence of the company with whom he had before dined. He began by earnestly warning his disciples against hypocrisy, which was "the leaven of the Pharisees," and corrupted all their services. (Notes, 11:44. Matt. 16:5—12. 23:13—28.)—The folly of hypocrisy is clearly seen, when it is considered that "there is nothing covered which shall not be revealed, neither hid that shall not be known;" and that it shall be discovered before the Judge himself, and the whole assembled world: so that, no one word, whispered in confidence most secretly, can escape detection. (8:17. Notes, Matt. 10:24—28. Mark 4:21,22. 1 Cor. 4:2—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.)—The solemn warning to "fear him, who after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell," is here addressed immediately to the friends of Christ: for even believers have often been rendered victorious over the dread of man's cruelty, by fear of falling under the wrath of Almighty God.—The word, here translated hell, always means the place of final and eternal punishment. V. 13, 14. It is evident, that earthly things had the ascendency in the mind of this man: though he seems to have had honourable thoughts of Jesus; when he desired him to require his brother, by authority, as a prophet, or as the Messiah, to give him that share of the inheritance, to which he supposed himself entitled. Perhaps, his brother was one of the assembled multitude; and this circumstance might induce the man to propose his request in so unseasonable a manner.—Our Lord, however, saw much wrong in his spirit and conduct, and in language, which implied reproof, asked, "Man, who made me a ruler and a divider over you?" Who appointed me to decide causes, or an umpire to divide inheritances? His "kingdom was not of this world:" (Note, John 18:33—36.) he appeared as a Teacher and a Saviour: he was not commissioned by the Father to take the civil magistrate' office out of his hand; and if he had attempted it, the people would have inquired of him, as the Israelite had formerly done of Moses, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" (Acts 7:27,35. Note, Ex. 2:13—15.)—'Christ would not, for three causes, be a judge to divide inheritances. First, for that he would not ... cherish the carnal opinion which the Jews had of the Messiah. Secondly, for that he would distinguish the civil governance from the ecclesiastical. Thirdly, to teach us to beware of them which abuse the show of the gospel, and also the name of ministers, to their own private advantage.' Beza.—'It is probable, that Christ refused to take this office upon him; ... chiefly, because he had but little time remaining, which he could better spend in dividing to them the word of life, and promoting their eternal interest.' Whitby. This reason is at least very forcible, in all similar cases, with ministers of the gospel: if they duly consider the shortness and uncertainty of life, the state of the world, the worth of souls, and the immense importance and arduousness of their work. (Notes, Acts 6:2—6. P. O. 1—7 Note, 1 Cor. 6:1—6.)

V. 15—21. Our Lord, according to his usual manner, took occasion from this improper intrusion, with great energy to warn his hearers against every kind or degree of covetousness, and all approaches to it: as neither the duration, comfort, credit, usefulness, or happy event of a man's life, consists in the abundance of his possessions. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 8—10.) To illustrate and enforce this caution, he spoke a parable, replete with instruction. The "rich man," described in it, is not said to have obtained his wealth by fraud or oppression, or to have been a penurious miser. (Note, 16:19—21.) He had an estate; and, by skilful and diligent culture, it yielded him large crops, so that his affluence increased rapidly: at length, however, he found difficulty about storing his treasures, seeing he had no longer room for them. He therefore determined to build larger barns, and granaries; and, having thus secured his abundance, to have done with the encumbrance of business, and to give himself up to ease and indulgence, in the liberal use of his riches. (Marg. Ref. g, k—n.) The character here drawn, is exactly that of a prudent worldly man, who rises from inferior circumstances to great affluence, by assiduous industry and good management; and then retires from business, to spend the latter part of his life according to his own inclina-

22 ¶ And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, [t]Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat: neither for the body, what ye shall put on.

23 The [u]life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.

24 Consider [x]the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have store-house nor barn; and God feedeth them. [y]How much more are ye better than the fowls?

25 And [z]which of you, with taking thought, can add to his stature one cubit?

26 If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, [a]why take ye thought for the rest?

27 Consider [b]the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, [c]That Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

28 If then God so clothe the grass, [d]which is today in the field, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, [e]O ye of little faith?

29 And [f]seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, neither [g]be ye of doubtful mind.

30 For [g]all these things do the nations of the world seek after; and [h]your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things.

31 But [i]rather seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you.

32 Fear not, [k]little flock; for [l]it is your Father's good pleasure to give you [m]the kingdom.

33 [n]Sell that ye have, and give alms; [o]provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth.

34 For [p]where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. [Practical Observations.] tions. But there was no grateful regard to the bountiful providence of God, "who gave him power to get wealth;" no consideration of his accountableness for the use of it; (Notes, 16:1—13.) and no respect to the authority, commandment, favour, or glory of God. There was no proper sense of the instability of human affairs, the uncertainty of life, the vanity of earthly pleasure, the worth of his soul, or the importance of eternity; no thought of happiness to be found in communion with God, in peace of conscience, and the hope of glory! But the man spake "within himself," as if "eating, drinking, and being merry" had constituted the chief good of a rational creature; and as if it might be enjoyed here for ever.* Neither did he express any regard to his neighbour: his wealth was his own, and he would hoard it for himself, and spend it on himself; for if he had inquired how many poor persons were destitute of food and raiment, and in various ways needed relief; he might have found a far better way to dispose of his superfluity, and have enjoyed a far superior satisfaction than what he proposed to himself.—[t] "What shall I do?" Give it to the poor, that shouldst thou do.' Basil. (Marg. Ref. h, i. 33.)—The whole was the language of a selfish ungodly man, and was intended to expose men of this character, even when not chargeable with gross immorality. However, therefore, this man might glory, that "the might of his hand had gotten him this wealth," and deem himself wise and happy; or however he might be envied, respected, or commended by his neighbours; he was in the judgment of God "a fool," and as such God addressed him. He had foolishly reckoned on many years to come, when he had not a single day to live! He had provided a large superfluity for a future continuance on earth, which was never to be granted him; but he had made no provision for the world to come, into which he was immediately to pass, and in which he was to exist to eternity! For, on that very "night his soul was required of him," and he must give an account of his ungodliness, selfishness, and covetousness; "and then whose would those things be, which he had provided," to the neglect of his soul, and to his everlasting ruin? He could not tell into whose hands his wealth would pass: nor would it be any comfort to him, even for his children or friends to possess it, when he was torn from all which he loved and idolized, and plunged into the pit of destruction; and perhaps they too were preparing by it for the same dreadful end. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 16:22—31. Ps. 39:6. Matt. 16:24—28. P. O. 21—28.)—To this parable our Lord added, that "so is every one, who layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God." All those persons "lay up treasure for themselves," who seek wealth either for its own sake, or for the influence and consequence which it bestows, or to spend in the pride of life and luxurious indulgence; or in order to aggrandize their families; but who are not rich in faith, in wisdom, and grace, in good works, and a heavenly treasure. (Notes, 22—34, vv. 33,34. Jam. 1:9—11. 2:5—7.) Every man of this character is in God's account "a fool;" his life is vanity and vexation; his success an empty bubble, or a destructive delusion: and his end most miserable.

V. 22—34. (Marg. Ref. t—i. Notes, Matt. 6:24—34.)—It is probable that our Lord frequently repeated the following instructions: and he here assigns the reason why he so often inculcated them; namely, because of the folly and fatal consequences of covetousness in all its forms, and the excessive proneness of the human heart to it, in one or another of them. The disciples were poor, and might think themselves unconcerned in the parable: not considering that the desire of riches, even when the pursuit of them is unsuccessful, is equally criminal, with the covetous acquisition and possession of them.—Some variation from the passage referred to may be noted. "If ye be not able to do that which is least, &c." (26) Whence we may infer, that the preceding question (25) was proverbial, and was used to show the inefficacy of being careful about those things which are not at all in our power. If a man were ever so solicitous about it, he "could not add a cubit to his stature:" why then should men be anxious about other matters, of far greater importance to their comfort and happiness, but which are unconnected with their present duty? For these also would be ordered by the same unerring hand of God, as he saw best, without their being able in the least to alter his appointments. Rich Zaccheus, probably, would have given a large sum to have "added a cubit to his stature." (19:3.)—"Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." (32) His disciples are a small flock of harmless defenceless sheep, in the midst of the vast multitudes of this wicked world; but they are dear to him, who has purchased them, and brought them back to his fold: and, as "their Father intends to give them the kingdom" of heavenly glory and felicity, and greatly delights in doing this; so he will certainly provide for them, during their passage through this world to it. They ought, therefore, to dismiss their fears, and to cast all their cares upon him. 'It is a foolish thing, not to look for small things at his hands, who freely giveth us the greatest things.' Beza. (Notes, Ps. 84:11,12. Rom. 8:32—34.) Instead of burdening themselves in endeavours to accumulate wealth, Christ's disciples ought, when properly called to it, to part with their possessions, and distribute to their needy brethren. When this is done in faith and love, it ensures to them a treasure, of which God himself is the Guardian. In this manner they are secured from putting their "money into a bag with holes," or into one liable to wear out: (which is an apt emblem of the uncertainty of all earthly possessions:) for their treasure is laid up in heaven, out of the reach of change or danger; and their hearts also become more and more heavenly.—Probably, this instruction influenced the primitive converts, after the day of Pentecost, to sell their estates for the support of their poor brethren. (Marg. Ref. k—p. Notes, 15—22. 19: 1—10, v. 8. Matt. 19:16—22, v. 21. Acts 4:32—35. Jam. 5:1—6.)

cares and anxieties, by the changing events of life, so long as they want to contrive and manage for themselves, and have not learned to trust God in the path of duty. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:17.)—That faileth not. (33) Ανεκλειπτον. Here only N. T. Εκ ανα, εκ, et λειπω, deficio.

V. 35—46. (Notes, Matt. 24:42—51.) Our Lord here addressed his disciples in respect of diligent attention to their proper work; as he before had done about moderation, indifference, and confidence in God, as to their subsistence. It was the custom of servants, in those days, to gird up their long loose garments by a girdle round their loins, that they might attend to their work with less encumbrance. Thus the disciples were reminded to be prepared for active service, by a vigilant frame of mind; and by laying aside every needless worldly engagement, and avoiding improper indulgencies; as well as strengthened for it by the habitual exercise of faith, hope, and love. (Marg. Ref. q. Note, 1 Pet. 1:13—16.) And as servants, during the night, when they were waiting for their master's return home, or engaged in any work, kept their "lights burning;" so the disciples were directed to keep the instructions of Christ before them, to make an open profession of his truth, and to hold out the light of a good conversation. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18.)—Weddings were then generally celebrated at night, and the return of the guests might be uncertain: the servants, therefore, when waiting for their master, must watch that they might open to him without delay: and by this simile our Lord might allude to his own ascension to heaven, his coming to call his people to him by death, and his return to judge the world; for which the disciples were continually to hold themselves in readiness. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Matt. 25:1—13. Mark 13:33—37.)—To induce them to this constant habitual preparation by the vigilant and diligent performance of their present work, in their several places, he further speaks in language peculiarly suited to excite attention and interest, on the blessedness of those servants whom he should "find watching," and the danger of being found unprepared or misemployed. In respect of the former, he says, that "the Lord will gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them:" that is, the Redeemer, "the Lord of glory," and the "Lord of all," will graciously condescend to employ all his power and authority, in advancing their honour and felicity; in proportion as they have simply devoted all their ability to promote his glory, and do his will. (Marg. Ref. x—b.)—In answer to Peter's inquiry, whether they only, or all his disciples, were concerned in these exhortations, promises, and warnings, our Lord intimated, that though the apostles and other ministers, who had authority in his church, were primarily intended, yet that others also were included, according to the different situations and services to which they were called. (Marg. Ref. c—o. Notes, 21:34—36. Mark 13:33—37.)—Unbelievers. (46) "Hypocrites," in Matthew. Hypocrites are concealed infidels, and they will have their portion among avowed infidels.

V. 47, 48. Our Lord here further showed, that his ministers, or professed disciples, would not only be severely punished for gross enormities, but also for neglecting or improperly performing their duty; and in proportion to the information afforded them, and the knowledge of their Lord's will which they had acquired. The servant, who knew what his Lord commanded him to do, and yet did not prepare himself for his work, and so did not duly perform it, would be severely punished; as servants were when scourged with many stripes: but he who had not received such explicit instructions, or had not attained to such distinct knowledge of his master's will, and was remiss and negligent in his work, would indeed be adjudged deserving of punishment, but not dealt with in so rigorous a manner. This may be considered as a general rule of the Lord's dealing with all his rational creatures. No man is left in such absolute ignorance, except by his own fault, as not to do many things which he knows to be wrong, and to neglect many things which he knows to be right: therefore all are inexcusable, and liable to condemnation and punishment, if they continue impenitent. But in proportion to the degree in which they have the means of instruction, and are actually acquainted with the will of God; their disobedience becomes more aggravated, more direct and deliberate rebellion, and their punishment will be proportionably more severe. (Notes, Rom. 2:12—16.) Thus likewise will the Lord dispense correction to his offending children, in proportion as they have sinned against light and conviction, or the contrary. For as men expect a proportional return from them, to whose stewardship they have committed much: so will God call every man to account for the use of all the talents intrusted to him; and if he has been unfaithful in the midst of many advantages, he will inflict on him the heavier vengeance. V. 49—53. The introduction of the gospel would in some respects resemble the kindling of a fire, which should occasion very destructive and wide-spreading desolations. Not that this is the tendency of Christianity, which is most pure, peaceable, and loving: but it would be the effect of the opposition raised against it, by the pride and lusts of men; and of the perversions which many would make of it. Hence would arise furious persecutions, bitter contentions, and multiplied 51 Suppose [b]ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division:

52 For from henceforth [c]there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three.

53 The father shall be divided against the son, [d]and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

54 ¶ And he said also to the people, [e]When ye see a cloud rise out of the west, straightway ye say, There cometh a shower; and so it is.

55 And [f]when ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat; and it cometh to pass.

56 Ye hypocrites, [g]ye can discern the face of the sky, and of the earth; but how is it [h]that ye do not discern this time?

57 Yea, and [i]why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?

58 When [k]thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, as thou art in the way, [l]give diligence that thou mayest be delivered from him; lest he hale thee to the judge, [m]and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and the officer cast thee [n]into prison.

59 I tell thee, [o]thou shalt not depart thence, till thou hast paid the very last [*]mite.

divisions, usurpations, and oppressions: and these things, with the resistance made to them, producing fierce and bloody wars, would diffuse manifold calamities and evils all over the earth. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Mic. 7:5—7. Matt. 10:34—36.)—Infidels have confidently alleged these consequences of the promulgation of Christianity, as so many objections to its divine original; wilfully forgetting that "thus it was written, and thus it must be." The prediction of these effects, which no philosophizing or speculative observer would ever have expected from so benign a religion, forms an additional demonstration that it is from God: and every man, who is experimentally acquainted with the human heart, will readily account for them, without charging the least blame on the gospel; nay, he will see, that they are occasioned by its excellency, and must follow from it, so long as men continue proud, carnal, selfish, and alienated from God.—To this our Lord added, "And what will I, if it be already kindled?"—'What would I, but that it were kindled.' Campbell. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) It may, however, refer to the malignant opposition of the scribes and Pharisees, and the divisions and contests which our Lord's ministry had already excited: yet, though the fire was indeed already kindled, did he regret that he had been so open in his instructions and sharp in his reproofs? Did they suppose that he was disappointed or disconcerted? Did they imagine that he meant to desist? This was by no means the case: on the contrary, he earnestly desired that this fire should be more completely kindled, by the full and extensive publication of his gospel. But before that could take place, "He had a baptism to be baptized with," far different from that "of water and of the Holy Spirit," by which he had been admitted to the exercise of his prophetical office: for he must endure the most extreme sufferings, shed his blood on the cross, and pour out his soul unto death, before he could enter upon his office within the veil, as the High-Priest of his church, and be put in full possession of the mediatorial throne. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Matt. 20:20—23.) "But how was he straitened, till this was accomplished!" It did not consist with the plan laid down for the performance of this work, to preach the gospel more openly or extensively, till this baptism was completed: in the mean time he was exceedingly straitened and limited, in the exercise of his ardent love and zeal: and even longed for that awful and important crisis, which should make way for his exaltation, and the publication of his gospel to all nations, that God might be glorified in the salvation of an innumerable multitude of precious souls; in the same manner, as a pregnant woman desires the approach or increase of her pangs, in expectation of deliverance and of being made a joyful mother. When the people saw a cloud rise in the west, from the Mediterranean sea, they had learned by constant observation to expect copious showers; and a south wind from off the sultry deserts was deemed a sure prognostic of heat. In such matters they were sagacious: but the exact accomplishment of types and prophecies, in the doctrine, miracles, and character of Christ, and in the time and circumstances of his appearance, did not suffice to convince them that he was their promised Messiah! In this, their hypocritical scribes and teachers were most faulty; and, being blinded by their carnal prejudices, they used their whole influence to mislead the people. Yet, as the case was so very evident, why did not the people see with their own eyes, and judge for themselves what was right, or decide impartially and justly between him and his malicious opponents? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Increasing popularity, and the earnest and diligent attendance of multitudes, must not induce ministers to be less plain and faithful in their addresses. This could only serve to multiply hypocrites; for even amidst "innumerable multitudes" of hearers, there is generally but a "little flock" of true disciples.—All who attend in any degree to religion, need repeated and earnest warnings, "first of all to beware of hypocrisy:" but they who are most deeply infected with this leaven will be most ready to take offence. Indeed the plainest warnings seldom have a salutary effect on those who are confirmed in hypocrisy; but they tend to prevent others from venturing on the same destructive course: for those who are under concern about their souls, but not established in the faith, are in various ways tempted to it. Yet, while it assumes many specious appearances, and promises great advantages, it is a most foolish, as well as hateful sin: it can only hide for a moment, what must at length be made known to all; and it confers a temporary reputation, but leads to "everlasting shame and contempt." Let us then continually think of that day, when our most secret actions, words, thoughts, and motives, will be proclaimed before men and angels; that we may be far more careful to approve our inmost purposes and our most retired conduct, to a heart-searching God, than to obtain the good opinion of our fellow-servants.—But if we are the "friends" of Christ, we must also be open and avowed in our religion, and on our guard against the fear of men: were we sure that our enemies would prevail as much as possible, we know that they could only "kill the body:" and after the transient pain occasioned by their cruel hatred, we should be for ever beyond their reach: whereas, should their terror induce us to incur the righteous displeasure of God, we know, that "after he hath killed, he hath power to cast into hell." If we are true believers, we are perfectly safe from every effect of man's enmity, which can prove eventually hurtful: and, while we realize the superintending providence of God over the meanest animal, we may be sure, that "even the very hairs of our heads are all numbered." Let us then boldly confess Christ before men, in joyful hope of being acknowledged by him before the angels of God; while they who have denied him for fear of reproach or persecution, will be rejected, and left under the condemnation to everlasting misery.—But let no trembling penitent, who in an unguarded hour has spoken "a word against the Son of man," doubt of obtaining forgiveness: for this is far different from that determined enmity, which dictates the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and which shall never be forgiven, because it will never be repented of. And let no one, who is suffering for Christ's sake, or called upon to speak in his name amidst his enemies, fear lest he should not by his "Holy Spirit teach him in the same hour what he ought to say;" for "they who trust in him shall never be confounded." (P. O. Matt. 10:16—33. 12:31—37. Notes, Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—34.)

V. 13—21. Alas! most men are too much immersed in thoughts and contrivances about the world, to value spiritual

CHAPTER XIII.

Jesus shows that calamities are no proof of peculiar guilt; and exhorts his hearers to repent, if they would escape impending ruin, 1—5. The parable of a barren fig-tree, which was to be cut down, 6—9. Jesus heals a woman who had been long bowed down, and silences the objection of the hypocritical ruler of the synagogue, 10—17: he compares the kingdom of God to a grain of mustard-seed, 18, 19, and to leaven, 20, 21. Being asked whether few should be saved, he warns the people to "strive to enter in at the strait gate," before it was finally shut, 22—30. He will not be diverted from his course, by the threateninge of Herod, 31—33. He predicts, and laments over, the approaching desolations of Jerusalem, 34, 35.

THERE were present at that season some that told him of [a]the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had [b]mingled with their sacrifices.

2 And Jesus answering said unto them, [c]Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things?

3 I tell you, Nay: but, [d]except ye repent, [e]ye shall all likewise perish.

4 Or those eighteen upon whom the tower [f]in Siloam [g]fell, and slew them, think ye that they were [c]sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem?

5 I tell you, Nay: but, [b]except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

6 ¶ He spake also this parable: A certain man blessings: and many, even while hearing the gospel, are so distracted in their thoughts about their inheritances, that they would be ready to interrupt the preachers, if they could by their counsel or influence promote their own secular interest! But, as Christ would not attend to these inferior concerns, his ministers should avoid similar interruptions to their grand concern; and leave it to others to be "judges and dividers" over the people.—Every opportunity, however, should be embraced of warning men to "take heed and beware of covetousness;" by which almost all men are, one way or other, in some degree seduced. Every reflecting man's experience and observation may convince him of the inefficacy of riches, to promote even the comfort or continuance of this life: yet after all which the Lord has said upon this subject, how few are there among professed Christians, who do not desire to be rich, and to make their children rich! (P. O. Matt. 19:23—30.) And many are apt to point out to them similar characters, with this in the parable, as models for their imitation, and as proper persons with whom to form connexions! Yet it is, as it were, said to one of them after another, "This night thy soul is required of thee," perhaps when they are saying within themselves, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." And what does it then avail, to have the public informed how many tens or hundreds of thousands they have left behind them, or how rich their heirs are made by their decease? (Note, Job 14:16—22.)—Indeed it often happens, that after men have spent their lives, without regard to God, to their neighbours, or their own souls, in order to enrich their families; they are even disappointed in this vain ambition, their riches are strangely dissipated, and their children reduced to dependence or poverty: for "man walketh in a vain show, he disquieteth himself in vain; he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them." As therefore "every one, who layeth up treasure for himself," is thus foolish, guilty, and miserable; let us seek the true riches, that we may be approved by God himself as wise men, and made honourable and happy in his presence and in the eternal enjoyment of his favour.

V. 22—34. If we are the disciples of Christ, and have learned to serve him in our secular employments, and in the use of our possessions, we should peculiarly watch against distracting cares and apprehensions. He who created our bodies, and sustains our lives, and who also feeds the ravens and adorns the lilies, will give us needful food and raiment: and if we have acquired a relish for spiritual pleasures, and know the value of "the beauty of holiness" we shall not crave the luxuries and elegances of life. Yet we often need rebuking for "being of little faith;" and therefore "of a doubtful mind." But it becomes Christians to seek nobler blessings, than the nations of the earth who know not God: they should remember that "their Father knoweth that they have need of" food and raiment, and is both able and willing to bestow them: and if we seek first the privileges and the righteousness of his kingdom, and desire its peace and prosperity, all other things will surely be added unto us. Indeed, the flock which the good Shepherd has purchased, and collected into his fold, and which he has taught to rely on his powerful and watchful care, to hear his voice, to love his ordinances, and copy his example, is but small; when compared with the vast multitudes around them, who resemble filthy swine, ravening wolves, subtle foxes, or venomous serpents: but they need not fear wanting any good thing, "for it is their Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom," and he will withhold no good things from them. (Notes, Matt. 11:25—27. Eph. 1:9—12. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) Let us then first examine, whether we belong to this "little flock," and have those dispositions which characterize it: let us also keep close under our Shepherd's care: and let us be thankful, that it was not the Lord's good pleasure to give us worldly treasures, and to leave us destitute of his grace. While others, therefore, are grasping after more and more of earthly, perishing vanities; Christians should excite one another to abound in love and good works: that, willingly expending what they have, in relieving the necessitous and promoting the cause of godliness, they may "provide themselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in heaven that faileth not;" and this will gradually both enlarge their capacities of enjoyment, and ensure to them a gracious and most glorious recompense. (Matt. 6: P O. 19—34.)

V. 35—48. While we cast all our care upon God, in respect of events and consequences, we cannot be too attentive to our duty. We are the servants of Christ, whose coming to remove us by death, or to judge the world, may be very soon, or very sudden: but if "our loins be girded and our lights burning," we shall have no more reason to dread the summons, than a child has to be alarmed at the arrival of a messenger who is sent to convey him home to his tender parents: nay, words can never express the delight with which our gracious Lord will welcome and bless his faithful servants. If then we are habitually watching and ready, what does it signify to us personally, whether he "come at the second or the third watch?" For "blessed are those servants, who . . . are found so doing." But as robbers assault the house, when the family has least expectation of them, so death generally surprises a man when he is least thinking of it. We should therefore never remit our watch, to pursue vain diversions, worldly interests, or sensual indulgences; lest our Lord should come at that very time. (Note, Rom. 13:11—14.) This indeed applies to every man, but more especially to the ministers of the gospel. They are "the stewards of God's mysteries," and rulers of his household, to "give every one his portion in due season," and "rightly to divide the word of truth." Happy then is that faithful and wise servant who delights in his work, and gives himself continually to it; for "his Lord, when he cometh, will make him ruler over all that he hath:" and how paltry are all other preferments, when compared with "this crown of glory that fadeth not away!" (Note, 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) But wo to infidels, and ungodly men, who appear in the garb of ministers! They say in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and so they are emboldened to persecute, oppress, and fleece their brethren, and to indulge in riot and licentiousness: but they will soon be surprised in the midst of their successful impiety, and torn away from all their abused preferments and dignities, "in a day when they think not of it;" and they will have their portion with the unbelievers. Those, however, who were thus ungodly, not only with the Bible in their hands, but with the gospel in their mouths; and who knew their Lord's will accurately, and could instruct others in it, yet never prepared themselves, or set about obeying it; will be punished in the most tremendous manner. Indeed the condemnation of heathens, and others who have had but few advantages for knowing the will of God, will be very light, compared with that of wicked professors of Christianity, and of ungodly ministers: "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required." May the Lord then give us grace, to improve our many advantages to the glory of his name! (Note, and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. P. O. Matt. 24:36—51.)

V. 49—59. We ought not to be greatly disconcerted at the undesirable effects occasioned by the preaching of the gospel; or even by the abuse which wicked men make of it. The blessed Jesus persevered in his work, though he saw "the fire already kindled," and foresaw how far it would communicate its flames: nay, he even longed for the hour of his extremest sufferings, that he might possess the "joy set before him," and send the gospel through the nations of the earth. We should therefore be bold and zealous in promoting his truth, without shrinking, from fear of consequences to ourselves or others: for, though afflictions must be endured, divisions excited, and "a man's foes be those of his own household;" yet sinners will be converted, and God will be glorified.—But if men were as wise for their souls, as most of them are in their temporal concerns, they would know "the signs of the times" and "the day of their visitation:" and though false teachers might attempt to prejudice or mislead them; they would "even of themselves discern what was right" and just and true, suitable to their wants and conducive to their salvation.—If any man therefore, is convinced that God has a controversy with him concerning his sins; let him without delay seek to him, as "God in Christ, reconciling the world to himself;" for if death come, before his peace be made with God, his soul will be cast into the prison of hell; and, as he will never be able to pay his mighty debt, so he must abide as an enemy, and hater, and blasphemer of God, in that doleful place of torment, to all eternity. (P. O. Matt. 18:23—35.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The Galileans, here mentioned, are supposed to have been concerned in the insurrection made by Judas of Galilee, (Acts 5:37.) who oppose-paying tribute to Cæsar, and submitting to the Roman authority. (Notes, 23:1—5. Matt. 22:15—22.) When, therefore, they were come to Jerusalem to worship, and were presenting their oblations in the court of the temple; Pilate sent a company of soldiers, who slew them, and "mingled their blood with their sacrifices." Those, who brought this report to Christ seem to have concluded, that these men were guilty of some dreadful crimes, concealed from men, but thus visited by an awful judgment from God; and that they were far greater sinners, than their countrymen who escaped the destruction: (Notes, John 9:1—3. Acts 28:3—6.) but our Lord repressed this rash and proud decision on their state and character; and assured the whole company, that except they repented of their sins, they too would fall under the righteous indignation of God, and perish "in like manner." This is generally supposed to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the slaughter of the Jews by the Romans, for making insurrections against the government: and especially to the havoc made among them, in the courts of the temple, while they were offering their sacrfices; insomuch that the altar was sprinkled with their blood, and a multitude of dead bodies lay round about it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ez. 9:5—7. 1 Pet. 4:17—19.)—This shows, that those who brought sacrifices were admitted into the inner court. (Notes, Lev. 1:5—9. 2 Chr. 23:3—10, v. 6.)—'Perhaps this story of the Galileans might now be mentioned unto Christ, with the design of leading him into a snare, whether he would justify, or condemn, the persons that were slain.' Doddridge.

V. 4, 5. Our Lord took occasion to mention another event, doubtless well known to his hearers, but of which there is no account in history, concerning eighteen persons who were slain by the falling of a tower in Siloam. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) These were supposed to have been greater sinners than any other inhabitants of Jerusalem; because they seemed to be singled out, by the hand of God himself, for immediate punishment. But Christ assured them that this was not the case; and he renewed his declaration, that except his auditors repented, they would "all likewise perish."—This is commonly supposed to refer to the destruction of the Jews in great multitudes, by the casting down of the walls and towers of Jerusalem, when the city was taken: but the sudden and dreadful slaughter of the Jews at that time, seems in general intended; as the immediate hand of God was gone forth against them.—It is observable, that our Lord determines nothing concerning the character and state of the persons in question: they were sinners, but not greater sinners than many others. (Note, Num. 27:1—4.)—No doubt he also intended to warn all men, in every age, that final and eternal ruin would certainly overtake all the impenitent, to whatever nation, society, or party they belonged.

Sinners. (4) "Debtors." Marg. Οφειλεται. Notes, 7:41—43. 11:1—4, v. 4. Matt. 6:12.

V. 6—9. (Notes, Is. 5:1—7. Matt. 21:17—20,33—44.) This parable seems to have been added to enforce the preceding warning. A fig-tree planted in a vineyard, would have every advantage of culture. In three years' time the young trees were expected to bear: (Note, Lev. 19:23—25.) but the owner of this tree is represented as coming three subsequent years to seek fruit, and as not finding any. It might therefore be concluded to be a barren tree, not fit to occupy the room, or appropriate the nourishment and culture which might be more profitably employed.—"The dresser of the vineyard," however, entreated that it might be spared for one more year; during which space he would use further means for rendering it fruitful; and then perhaps it would produce fruit, but otherwise it ought to be cut down.—The Jewish nation seems to have been primarily intended: the Lord had long borne with their unfruitfulness amidst manifold advantages, and the time of his vengeance approached. They would, however, be spared a little longer; that the apostles and preachers of the gospel might make another vigorous and zealous effort to bring them to repentance, faith, and holiness: and if this failed, they must be given up to ruin. For Jerusalem would be destroyed, the ceremonial worship terminated, and the unbelieving Jews cast out of the church, to make way for the calling of the Gentiles.—The parable, however, is equally applicable to the case of all those individuals, who continue unfruitful under the means of grace: though spared from time to time, through the long-suffering of the Lord, they will at length be cut down by death, and cast into hell, "except they repent" and "bring forth fruits meet for repentance."—Some expositors speak, as if Christ himself was represented by "the dresser of the vineyard;" and indeed the long-suffering of God with sinners is the effect of his mediation: yet he seems rather to be the Owner of the vineyard, who sentences the barren trees to be cut down. Besides, his intercession is never finally in vain: (Note, John 17:6—10, v. 9.) and the language used may describe the fervent prayers and zealous labours of faithful ministers, who earnestly desire to prevent the ruin of the people. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Jer. 14:10—22. 15:1. Ez. 14:13—21. Matt. 3:7—10.)

V. 10—17. This woman must have attended the worship of God with great difficulty; as she was so bowed together, that she "could in no wise lift up herself," but was forced to go almost double. The calamity, under which she had so long laboured, would in general have been considered as a very remarkable disease, arising from some known or unknown natural cause: but it was at that time justly ascribed to an evil spirit; so that in fact "Satan had bound her eighteen years." (Notes, Matt. 8:28,29. Mark 9:16—24.)—Our Lord, seeing her in this afflicted state, called her to him, and by his word, attended with the laying on of his hands, immediately restored her; and, being made straight, she glorified God before all, for this most desirable and unexpected deliverance. (Note, Ps. 146:8.) But the ruler of the synagogue, who evidently hated the doctrine, and envied the honour, of Christ, yet attempted to veil his enmity with the appearance of singular piety; told the people in anger, that they ought to come for healing on other days, and not on the holy rest of the sabbath: as if the woman had come to the synagogue on purpose for a cure; or as if a word and a touch, attended with so powerful and beneficent an effect, could break the sabbath. The malice and hypocrisy of the man were therefore evident, and our Lord severely rebuked him; showing, that none even of the scribes and Pharisees, scrupled to water their cattle on the sabbath-day; though it was attended with some labour, and was necessary only to preserve the animals from the uneasiness of a day's thirst, or the owner from some temporal loss which might result from it: and could it then be questioned, whether it were right to relieve a rational creature, a descendant of Abraham, (probably an heir of his faith,) from her long-continued calamity, on that holy day; even if it had been effected by labour? This reply was so satisfactory and conclusive, that it silenced and put to shame the ruler, and all the other adversaries of Jesus, and caused the people to rejoice in his glorious miracles, as so many proofs of his being the promised Messiah. V. 22—30. It is probable that our Lord was now on his last journey from Galilee towards Jerusalem, in which he took a large circuit, and spent considerable time: so that he no more visited the northern part of the land, till after his resurrection. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) While he was teaching the people, a person asked him, "Are there few that be saved?" Or, "Are the saved few?" Perhaps the man inferred this from his doctrine, and was prejudiced against him on that account; or he deemed this inconsistent with the preceding parables. It was, however, a curious question, though it does not appear that the man had any ill design in it. Our Lord therefore did not directly answer him, but took occasion to inculcate a most important exhortation: 'It not being our concern to know how many shall be saved; but how we may be saved.' Whitby.—The whole context shows, that no temporal preservation, but deliverance "from the wrath to come," and inheriting eternal life, were meant; as the subsequent mention of the strait gate fully proves. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, Matt. 7:13,14.) "The strait gate" is the passage, from "the broad way to destruction" into "the narrow way to life;" that is, a sinner's conversion and reconciliation to God, by repentance and faith in Jesus Christ. Many difficulties must occur in thus "passing from death unto life:" the gate is beset with enemies; and much must be left behind, broken off, broken through, overcome, and attained, in getting in at it; yet without this there can be no salvation. They therefore, who would be saved, must "strive to enter in at the strait gate;" they must struggle with all their force, and employ all their attention and circumspection, as those did who wrestled in the public games. (Marg. Ref. a.)—'Force your way in at the strait gate.' Campbell.—To excite them to this, Christ, the Saviour and Judge of men, solemnly assured them, that "many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able." Some seek admission into the favour of God and eternal happiness, without conversion, or faith in the divine Saviour; others seek the blessing in a slothful manner, or in the use of such means as God has never appointed; others, with reserves for their worldly interests, reputation, or sinful pleasures, or for avoiding reproach and persecution. In these and similar ways, many come short of salvation; notwithstanding convictions, temporary seriousness and earnestness, and partial reformation. But, it is by procrastination especially, that men at last "will seek to enter in, and not be able. While life endures, the Master of the house," the Lord Jesus sits, as it were, at mercy's gate, over which it is written, "Knock, and it shall be opened to you:" but at length he rises up, and by cutting off a sinner in his unconverted state, he "shuts the door" against him, and bars it for ever. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Gen. 7:16. Matt. 7:7—11.) Many therefore, even of those who then heard Christ, would first "begin to knock" at the gate, and to seek salvation from him, when it was too late, and whatever presumptuous confidence they had before entertained, or whatever plea they might have to urge, these would in no wise prevail for admission. For though they could truly say, that they had sat at table with him, or welcomed him to their tables, and that he had taught in the streets of their cities; yet he would disown all acquaintance with them, and drive them from him as "workers of iniquity." (Notes, 16:24—26. Matt. 3:7—10. 7:21—23. 11:20—24. 25:41—46.) At that tremendous season, their anguish and misery would be enhanced, by beholding the happiness of patriarchs and prophets, yea, of immense numbers of the Gentiles, from every quarter of the globe; who would be saved by the promised Messiah, through repentance and faith, whilst they perished through unbelief and impenitence; for "the first would be last, and the last first." (Notes, Prov. 1:20—33. Is. 55:6,7. Matt. 8:10—12. 19:29,30.)—In this address our Lord evidently declared to the people, that their admission into life and happiness, or exclusion from them, entirely and absolutely depended on him alone.

V. 31—33. Our Lord still continued within Herod's jurisdiction: and his miracles, doctrine, and reputation, excited much uneasiness in that wicked prince, who probably menaced him, rather in hope of driving him to a distance, than with any intention of proceeding against him. The Pharisees also, of those parts, wanted to remove him from them: and therefore they warned him to go thence; for otherwise Herod had determined to put him to death. But Christ directed them to inform "that fox," that subtle, insinuating, and mischievous man, (Marg. Ref. r. Note, Ez. 13:1—4.) that he should proceed with his work without regarding him: he must continue to work his miracles of mercy for a very short time longer, as it were "that day and the morrow;" and then, as "on the third day," he should be perfected by his sufferings, which would complete his work on earth, and make way for his mediatorial exaltation. Nevertheless, though his time was short, he must needs go openly from place to place, while it lasted: and though he certainly should soon be put to death, yet that would not be by the hands of Herod, in Galilee; for "it could not be that a prophet should perish out of Jerusalem." That city had, as it were, an exclusive claim to the guilt and infamy of murdering the prophets of God; and it was not proper that the great Prophet of the church should lay down his life in any other place.—As John the Baptist and others had been slain elsewhere, it is evident that this sentence must not be taken strictly: it was a general rule, and Jesus, the Messiah, would not be an exception to it.—This message was in fact a defiance sent to Herod: but his wickedness in slaying John the Baptist, contrary to the conviction of his own conscience, being added to all his other crimes, rendered it improper for our Lord to show him any regard. (Note, 23;6—12.)—'I know that subtle tyrant, who hath shed the blood of my forerunner, is hunting after my death also: but tell him from me, that my times are set in the eternal counsel of God, ... and when my prefixed time is accomplished, for my labours and sufferings, I shall, in spite of all the opposition of earth and hell, be perfected, and enjoy my full glory.' Bp. Hall.—'The word signifies, I am consecrated to my priestly office, by dying a sacrifice for the sins of the world.' Whitby.—The offering of this sacrifice, however, was itself a most essential part of our Lord's priestly office; and introductory to the rest, which having finished on earth, he "ascended into heaven," to appear in the presence of God "for us." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. As no place or employment can secure us from the stroke of death, we should always be preparing for it: and instead of considering the sudden or extraordinary deaths of our neighbours or countrymen, as proofs that they were "sinners above other men," we should endeavour to improve them as warnings to ourselves: for when dire calamities are reported, it may be said to sinners of every age and nation, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Nay, whatever we read in the Scriptures of the misery of the wicked in hell, is intended to speak the same important warning to each of us. Those who hear the gospel and associate with the people of God, and yet continue impenitent and unconverted, are the barren fig-trees in the Lord's vineyard: from time to time he comes seeking fruit on them; but finding none, he at length condemns them to be cut down as "cumberers of the ground;" that they may no longer disgrace his church in the eyes of those who are without, or prevent the fruitfulness of those within. (Notes, and P. O. John 15:1—8.) Indeed when faithful ministers behold such barren trees in their congregations, (alas, how numerous are they!) and when they fear that they are about to be cut down and cast into the fire; they are led, both by inclination and duty, to pray that they may be spared a little longer, and they desire to use every additional means for their salvation with redoubled assiduity: yet if at last they continue unfruitful, their most affectionate pastors must acknowledge the justice of the sentence, by which they are cut off to make way for more useful characters.—It behooves every one of us to inquire, how long we have been favoured with the means of grace, and borne with by the long-suffering of God; and to examine whether we be now bearing fruit to his glory, and the good of men, or be still mere "cumberers of the ground." Such inquiries are peculiarly proper to be made at the beginning of a new year, or the return of any other periodical season. And when any are restored from sickness, and spared a little longer, in answer to the prayers of ministers or Christian friends; surely they should take their admonitions in good part, and seek to profit by their endeavours; remembering how short their respite may be, and how soon they may be cut down, if not at length rendered fruitful.—But alas! many of these despise and revile such as pray and labour for their salvation, and "watch for their souls as those who must give account, that they may do it with joy and not with grief!"

V. 10—21. We must indeed not rest in means and ordinances, but we should thankfully attend on them. If we would have a blessing from Christ, we must frequent the assemblies of his people, especially on his holy day: and even if we come thither with pain and trouble, we shall not have cause to repent. We are not concerned or competent to determine, what influence Satan has in occasioning or increasing our bodily diseases: but we know, that he has bound our souls with the chain of our own sinful propensities, so that we are not able in any wise to lift up or liberate ourselves: and this has been the case with numbers for many years, while their evil habits have continually been strengthening, and rendering their case more hopeless. But if Jesus speak the word, and put forth his healing power; even these will immediately be loosed, and their crooked judgments and dispositions rectified: and they will, without delay, be able and willing to glorify God by word and deed. This deliverance is most frequently wrought on the Lord's day; and whatever labour tends to put men in the way of receiving this blessing, or in being instrumental in its being communicated to them, must peculiarly accord to the pious and beneficent intention of that sacred season of rest.—But they who hate the gospel and its blessed effects, always find some objection to make against every instance of the power of divine grace: and when this is accompanied by a professed exactness in externals; the hypocrisy of it may often be shown, by observing that they do things of the same kind for their own secular interest, which they blame others for doing to promote the salvation of souls. But evident good works connected with a blameless conversation, and defended by convincing arguments, must at length silence the most malicious adversaries, and bear testimony to men's consciences of the power and presence of God with us: and let enemies be never so numerous or malicious, his kingdom will continue to increase in the world, till it fills the whole earth; and in every renewed soul, till it has perfectly communicated its heavenly savour and nature to all its faculties, dispositions, and affections.

V. 22—30. When we reflect on the immense multitudes of the human species, it is very awful to consider, how very few of them appear to be in the way of salvation, as that is marked out in the word of God: and the very proposal of the question considered in all its awful importance, causes the soul to recoil appalled from the reflection. Yet let us rather look to ourselves, than waste our time in calculations or curious inquiries about others. It will not avail us how few, or how many, shall be saved, if we be not of that number; and if we be, we shall at length approve of the appointments of God in this and in every other respect. Nor will the awful truth, that few comparatively have hitherto been saved, prevent our being of the happy number, if we seek salvation as our grand object, according to the oracles of God. Every unconverted sinner should then "strive to enter in at the strait gate," by earnest prayer, by resisting temptations, by avoiding all occasions of committing sin, or silencing his conscience, and hardening his heart, and by attending diligently on every means of grace: and every one of us should continue thus to labour and wrestle, that we may make "our calling and election sure." But with what solemn attention, and application to our own souls, should we hear our Judge declare that "many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able!" We are indeed assured that none shall seek the Lord, when and where he may be found, as in Christ, and on a throne of grace, by humble faith and fervent prayer, and at last fail of obtaining the blessing: but let all men beware of a proud, a slothful, a hypocritical, a partial seeking; and above all of procrastination. How dreadful will be the disappointment of those, who hoped and intended at some future time to enter the strait gate; but who deferred the grand concern, from worldly motives, till it became too late, and the door was for ever shut against them! In vain will they call Christ, Lord, Lord, and entreat him to open to them: in vain will they plead, that they heard his ministers, entertained them at their own tables, and frequented his table. he will utterly disregard their pleas, and refuse all pity to their anguish; while he shall sentence them "to depart from him, as workers of iniquity," whom he never acknowledged to be in the number of his redeemed people: and even the felicity of those, with whom they formerly associated, as well as that of others whom they disdained, will add poignancy to their misery and despair. As there were such persons among our

CHAPTER XIV.

Jesus, on the sabbath, heals a man who had the dropsy, and justifies himself in so doing, 1—6. By parables he teaches humility, 7—11; and hospitality to the poor, 12—14. The parable of the great supper, 15—24. The necessity of self-denial, and renouncing the world, in order to be the disciples of Christ, inculcated and illustrated by similes, 25—33. The worthlessness of salt which has lost its savour, 34, 35.

AND it came to pass, [a]as he went into the house of one of the [b]chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath-day, that [c]they watched him.

2 And, behold, there was a certain man before him which had the dropsy.

3 And Jesus answering spake unto [d]the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, [e]Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day?

4 And [f]they held their peace. And he took him, and healed him, and let him go;

5 And answered them, saying, [g]Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath-day?

6 And [h]they could not answer him again to these things.

7 ¶ And he [i]put forth a parable to those which were bidden, when he marked how [k]they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them,

8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room, lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him;

9 And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; [l]and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room.

10 But when thou art bidden, [m]go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: [n]then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee.

11 For [o]whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased: and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. [Practical Observations.]

12 ¶ Then said he also to him that bade him. [p]When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, [q]and a recompense be made thee.

13 But when thou makest a feast, [r]call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind:

Lord's hearers, among those whom he fed by miracle, or with whom he sat down to meat; and as there was a Judas even among his own apostles; we ought surely to address our congregations in a similar manner; to put the case, that many of them may at last be found in this awful condition; and to enforce our warnings and exhortations by such alarming topics, addressed to them directly, in the second person; and not merely to speak of such characters in a general way, which may be understood to imply our opinion, that none of them are found in our audience. But especially we ought to examine ourselves, and not to take things for granted by an unwarranted confidence, where such infinite interests are at stake. None, however, ought to yield to despondency, either with respect to himself or others: for, "behold, there are last who shall be first, and first who shall be last:" and, though few of our immediate relations or neighbours should appear to be in the way of salvation; yet there will be others brought from every part of the earth, and the multitude of the saved will in all be found immensely large. (P. O. Matt. 7:13—29. 8:5—13.)

V. 31—35. It does not in general behoove us to speak disrespectfully of any who are invested with authority: yet apostates, persecutors, and crafty dissemblers may, on some occasions, be spoken of in their true characters, that men may beware of them; and we must not flatter the wicked, or fear any man, when performing our bounden duty. We too should "go about doing good," while our appointed span of life endures: and in that case when life expires, we shall be perfected in holiness and felicity.—But how black a mark of human depravity was the extraordinary circumstance of Jerusalem's being the slaughterhouse of God's prophets, and the very place where his beloved Son was crucified! Alas! the visible church has generally been the grand scene of persecution; (Note, Rev. 17:6.) and those whom the Saviour has, with persevering tenderness, invited to take shelter under the shadow of his almighty wings, have not only contemptuously refused his kindness, but have hated and persecuted those who brought the invitation! (Note, Matt. 22:1—10.) Thus men bring upon themselves swift destruction from the presence of the Lord, as well as the forfeiture of all their privileges: but let us shun this fatal rock, and learn thankfully to welcome and to profit by all those "who come in the name of the Lord" Jesus, to invite us to partake of his great salvation.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1—6. (Notes, 7:36. 11:37, 38.) Some think that this chief Pharisee was a ruler also, or one of the Sanhedrim or great council of the nation, but perhaps he was only a person of influence and authority among the Pharisees. He, however, (as well as some others who invited Jesus,) seems to have had an insidious design in entertaining him; and to have combined with several of his brethren in endeavouring to entangle him. But our Lord would not on that account be deterred from healing a man, afflicted with the dropsy, who probably came thither for that purpose. When they had declined answering his question, respecting the lawfulness of doing this, he took the man by the hand, and having healed him, so that his restoration to health was manifest to all, he sent him away: and then showed, that compassion for an animal, or regard to their own property, would have induced any of them to far more labour than what they blamed in him, where the life or comfort of a brother was concerned. Thus silenced their objections, though it did not subdue their enmity. (Marg. Ref. Notes. 13:10—17. Matt. 12:1—13. Mark 3:1—5.)

V. 7—11. The scribes and Pharisees seem not to have attended even to that semblance of humility, under which numbers veil their pride and ambition, that they may more successfully gratify them: but they openly contended for precedency; probably on the score of their reputation for wisdom, learning, or piety, or on account of their rank and authority: and they chose out for themselves the chief seats, thus claiming the highest respect as justly due to them. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 20:45—47. Matt. 23:5—7.) This disgraceful competition, however, though it rose from the same source, was merely a shadow of that spiritual pride and ambition, which has excluded numbers from the kingdom of Christ, produced the most lamentable effects in the visible church, and done immense injury even to many true Christians and ministers. Our Lord therefore, in a mild, yet firm and decisive manner, reproved the vainglory of the guests, by a parable addressed, as it were, to each of them, the substance of which was taken from their own scriptures. (Note, Prov. 25:6,7.) If any of them were invited to a marriage-feast, which was the principal festive occasion, let him not aspire to the highest place; lest a more honourable person should be present, whom the master of the feast should deem entitled to the precedency. In this case, being required to give place to his superior, and the intermediate places being occupied, he would be sent with disgrace to take the lowest place. On the contrary, let him go at first to the situation intended for the meanest of the company, as claiming no honour and pre-eminence; and then the master of the house might think it proper to desire him to go up higher, which would procure him respect and deference among the other guests.—Thus the Christian should deem it honour enough for him, a poor sinful and rebellious creature, to be admitted among the redeemed in the lowest form: and not contend for eminent stations, authority, or reputation: for such ambition only tends to disgrace. (Notes, 22:24—27. Acts 8:18—24.) But he ought, in unaffected humility, to take the lowest station, or the meanest service, preferring others to himself: (Notes, Rom. 12:9—13, v. 10. Phil. 2:1—4, v. 4.) and in due time he will, in this manner, obtain "the honour which cometh from God;" and he will have the approbation of angels and men at the day of judgment. For it is an universal rule of the Lord's dealings with every individual, in respect of the various incidents and actions of their lives, that "he abases those who exalt themselves;" and advances "those who abase themselves," as conscious of their actual and comparative worthlessness, and as willing to be little, despised, neglected, and subjected to others. 15 ¶ And when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, [u]Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God.

16 Then said he unto him, [x]A certain man made a great supper, and [y]bade many:

17 And sent [z]his servant at supper-time to say to them that were bidden, [a]Come; for all things are now ready.

18 And they [b]all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, [c]I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused.

20 And another said, [d]I have married a wife; and therefore I cannot come.

21 So that servant came [e]and showed his lord these things. Then the master of the house, [f]being angry, said to his servant, [g]Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither [h]the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind.

22 And the servant said, Lord, [i]it is done as thou hast commanded, [k]and yet there is room.

23 And the lord said unto the servant, [l]Go out into the highways, and hedges, and [m]compel them to come in, that my house may be filled.

24 For I say unto you, [n]That none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper.

V. 12—14. The Pharisee at whose table Jesus was sitting, seems to have been a person of eminence; and had probably prepared an expensive entertainment for the company, though this was on the sabbath-day, and must have been attended with some labour: for perhaps the Pharisees were as ostentatious in their feasts, as in their fasts. Our Lord therefore saw it proper to point out the criminality of the practice: and he counselled his host, when he made a dinner or a supper, not to invite his "friends, or relations, or rich neighbours," but on the contrary to invite the poor, and those who by divers bodily infirmities were incapable of procuring the necessaries or comforts of life; (21) a great number of whom might be feasted with the same expense which would be incurred to entertain a few of the rich. In this manner he would "be blessed:" as his guests could not recompense him, except by their prayers, and he would receive his reward at "the resurrection of the just." It is not to be supposed that Jesus meant, absolutely and universally, to prohibit men from entertaining their wealthy friends, relations, and neighbours; and poor relations are as proper to be invited as other poor persons: yet they, who are most applauded for their useless generosity in this respect, are seldom very eminent for real charity, not always for strict honesty; and our Lord shows his disciples a more excellent way. The profusion occasioned by feasting the rich, serves to gratify a man's vanity and pride, and the sensual appetites of his friends; who in return are tempted to run into similar extravagance, of which the consequences are often very fatal, and it renders a man incapable of relieving the poor, in any adequate degree. Such expenses cannot be incurred from love to God, or regard to his authority, favour, or glory; therefore no recompense can be expected from him: and human applause, or a similar banquet in return, is the only reward of them. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, 6:27—36. Prov. 22:16. Matt. 6:1—4.) But when a man, from proper motives, expends his wealth in relieving the distressed and indigent, he derives the greatest satisfaction imaginable from this use of it, and his gracious Lord will abundantly reward it in another world. It certainly is not meant, that God will "recompense, at the resurrection of the just," a proud and unbelieving liberality to the poor: but our Lord spoke for the instruction of his disciples in every age; and the less they spend in "conformity to the world," by luxurious feasting of the rich, the more they will have to employ in feeding the poor, and in all those fruits of faith and love, "which are by Christ Jesus to the praise and glory of God." (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—How clearly does it appear, that a future state of retribution was a prominent article of the general or popular creed, among the Jews at this time!

V. 15—24. The person, who made the remark which gave occasion to this parable, seems to have alluded to the satisfactions to be enjoyed in the days of the Messiah, under the figure of "eating bread in the kingdom of God;" though the thought might occur to him from what our Lord had spoken of "the resurrection of the just." "Eating bread" was a common expression for any kind of meal, however plentiful or even luxurious, and it is probable, that the man entertained low and carnal expectations concerning the kingdom of God. (Marg. Ref. u.) Our Lord, therefore, to show him how little the blessings to be conferred by the Messiah, would prove suited to the taste of the Jews in general, and how generally they would refuse them; thus describing their present and future conduct respecting his gospel, spake the parable here recorded. (Marg. Ref. x—a. Notes, Prov. 9:1—6. Is. 25:6—8. 55:1—3. Matt. 22:1—14.)—The "great supper" represented the plenteous provision made for the souls of men in the redemption of Christ: the previous invitation denotes the promises and prophecies of his salvation, to the Jews of old; the ministry of John the Baptist, and that of Christ himself and his apostles. The servants being sent to "call those who had been bidden," when "all things were ready," may signify the preaching of the apostles and evangelists after Christ's ascension. The invited persons all "with one consent" desiring to be excused, though on different pretences, may represent the general rejection of the gospel by the Jewish nation, especially by their rulers, teachers, and Pharisees: the servants being then sent forth into "the streets and lanes of the city," to call in the poor, lame, and blind, may intimate the success of the gospel among the publicans, and common people of the Jews; and among those who were dispersed in other countries, and the proselyted Gentiles: and when the servants were sent out to "the highways and hedges," to fetch in the poor strangers and travellers, the calling of the Gentiles seems to have been principally intended, with whom the church has since been chiefly replenished; while the Jews who were first invited are, through their unbelief, excluded from it. (Marg. Ref. b—l, n.)—The whole parable, however, may be applied to the preaching of the gospel, and the reception which it meets with, in every age.—The excuses, here stated, were all taken from things lawful in themselves: yet from the manner in which they were attended to, they became the occasion of the greatest contempt being shown to the feast, and to him who made it. Nothing could be more frivolous than for one man to go to see his estate, and another to prove his oxen, (after they had been bought,) just at the hour when they were invited to the feast; when they might easily have deferred these matters to another time. The man who pleaded "that he had married a wife, and therefore could not come," is supposed by some to have meant that his own marriage-feast was fixed for the same time; but as the marriage was past, the feast also may be supposed to have been over. It shows, however, that a carnal mind gives every thing the preference to Christ and his salvation, instead of using all in entire subserviency to them. Indeed all these excuses, thus pointed out, are intended to teach us, that contempt of spiritual blessings, and inordinate attachment to worldly objects, are the real causes of men's negligence and procrastination in religious matters: and the circumstances of those who "desired to be excused," when compared with the poverty of such as were the guests at last, especially shows, that pride and self-sufficiency are incompatible with the faith of the gospel.—The servants were ordered "to compel" those "from the highways and hedges to come in." It would be absurd to understand this of compulsive force, which would be a strange way of bringing men to a banquet, though great numbers have thus explained it! and this proves that scriptural arguments for persecution are not to be found. It shows also that the objections against the doctrine of 'special grace,' as if inconsistent with free agency, are wholly groundless; unless the inward blessing of God, on proper means, producing willingness where it did not before exist, inclining the heart, and so 'preventing us that we may have a good will,' be more inconsistent with free agency, than urgent and pressing invitations to a feast are. (Notes, Ps. 110:3. Phil. 2:12,13.) It might, however, be supposed that poor travellers, or beggars, would not readily be convinced that the feast was intended for them; and therefore repeated pressing invitations would be peculiarly proper: and thus our Lord would have his ministers use most earnest and affectionate invitations, persuasions, and expostulations, and whatever can convince the understanding, or affect the heart, or give encouragement: especially when they address those who, by the greatness of their guilt, may be tempted to despair of mercy. V. 25—27. As our Lord journeyed towards Jerusalem, great multitudes flocked about him: but he knew that they had generally very erroneous notions of his kingdom, and were not prepared to submit to the losses and privations, or to encounter the various dangers and difficulties, which certainly awaited his true disciples. If, therefore, they followed him in their present temper, they would leave him in the time of trial to the discredit of the cause, the discouragement of others, and the ruin of their own souls. He therefore turned himself, and addressed them in a manner which was apparently calculated to drive them from him: (Note, Josh. 24: 19.) assuring them, that though they came assiduously to hear him; they could not be his disciples, except they hated their nearest relations, and even their own lives. Men are in general expressly required to honour and to love these relations, and to take care of their own lives. But this love and regard must be entirely subordinated to the love of Christ; and they must give his favour, will, and glory, a decided preference to the approbation, interests, or comfort of their dearest relatives: so that they may often be required to act towards them, as though they hated them: disobeying their injunctions, thwarting their inclinations, rejecting their entreaties, renouncing the comfort of their society, or turning it into bitterness by exciting their resentment. (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, Gen. 29:30,31. Deut. 13:6—11. P. O. Note, 33:9.) Nay, at some times they may be called to be, as it were, cruel to themselves, (in respect of temporal life,) as well as to their friends; exposing themselves to persecution, torture, and death, if they will obey Christ. So that unless they are habitually prepared, by a deep sense of their need of his salvation, and of their immense obligations to him, to venture every consequence, and meet any extremity rather than forsake him, they "cannot be his disciples:" for in that case they will refuse to bear their cross and go after him. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. 16:24—28. Mark 8:31—38. 2 Cor. 5:16.)

V. 28—33. To show the very great importance of the subject, our Lord next inquired, whether every man of common prudence did not calculate the expense, before he began to build a tower; that he might form a previous judgment, whether he should be able to complete the work or not. For if a man neglected this: and, having begun to build, was afterwards compelled to leave the edifice unfinished; he would not only lose all his labour and expense, but the building itself would remain a monument of his indiscretion, and excite the derision and mockery of all who beheld it. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) Thus, if a man should profess himself a follower of Christ, without considering what losses, trials, self-denial, or sufferings it might expose him to, or how he might be enabled to endure them, his constancy would at length fail; all he had given up or endured would be in vain; and his apostacy would render him contemptible and miserable.—The same might also be illustrated by the case of a prudent king, who would not declare war, or persist in a competition with a more powerful monarch; without considering whether his resources, situation, or alliances, were such as to give him a reasonable prospect of success: otherwise he would endeavour, whilst his enemy was at a distance, to obtain the best terms of peace that he could. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, Prov. 20:18. 24:3—6. 25:8—10.)—To become the disciple of Christ implies a declaration of war against Satan, sin, and this evil world, which are far too powerful for any man to withstand in his own strength: unless a sinner therefore be led to such a conviction of his own weakness, and of the power of his enemies, as to seek help from God, he will never stand his ground: and in all cases, the warfare will be attended with so many hardships, perils, and losses, that if a man be not aware of them, and instructed how to support them, he will never be able to "continue to the end." Though it is, therefore, desperate for him to remain in his present state of subjection to his enemies; yet it will rather make the matter worse, for him to take up a mere profession of the gospel, without that sincerity, humility, and entire dependence on Christ, which alone can give him victory in the conflict.—In like manner, "whosoever he be of you," said Jesus, "that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." (Marg. Ref. a.) It would not in general consist with a man's duty, to leave his business and relatives, or to quit possession of his estate: but he must be prepared for this, whenever the commandment or the providence of God may call him to it. In this way a professed disciple will be repeatedly put to the trial: he will be called on, in steadily acting according to his principles and conscience, to blast his opening prospects of preferment, reputation, or riches; to renounce worldly pleasures; to forego relative comforts and agreeable friendships; and to bear losses, reproaches, and various hardships, for the sake of Christ: and in times of fierce persecution, (such as were at hand when this was spoken,) he may be required to renounce his country, friends, and possessions, to become an exile or a captive, and to part with his liberty or his life; otherwise he cannot follow Christ as his true disciple. (Notes, Matt. 16:24—28. 19:16—22. Phil. 3:8—11.)—The judgment and disposition of a martyr every Christian must possess: these will habitually be evinced in inferior concerns; and, when it becomes necessary, God will strengthen him, and enable him to bear the greatest extremities for his sake. Many things may hereafter be expedient and useful, which are not essential to being a Christian: but this decided preference of Christ to the whole world, and to life itself, when placed in competition with him, is the very heart, or the most vital part, of Christianity. (Notes, Matt. 13:44—46.)

V. 34, 35. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 5,13. Mark 9:43—50.) Without that holy and spiritual preparation of heart above described, professed Christians, or preachers, can only be as "salt that has lost his savour," which, instead of preserving other bodies from corruption, or giving them a pleasant relish, is itself most incurably tasteless and worthless. Men of this description can be no real credit or advantage to the church, or to the world; and they are commonly more incurable in their presumption and impenitence, than any other sinners. After a temporary profession they generally decline, till they totally apostatize; and they often run into destructive heresies, and endeavour to propagate them; so that they become the most worthless of men: and as this subject is of universal importance, it demands the serious attention of every one "that hath ears to hear." (Marg. Ref. c.)—It is evident, that "salt" is here spoken of in popular language, according to the uses which are made of it in common life, and not as a chemist would define it; and that the common opinion, that the residue, when the saline particles were separated, was of no use for manure, or any other purpose, was mentioned merely by way of illustrating the subject.—It is clear, that "salt may lose its savour;" and that true Christians might lose the principle of divine life, unless God have engaged to preserve it: (Notes, 22:31—34. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) but in respect of all those mentioned in Scripture, who became like "salt which hath lost its savour," some intimation is annexed that there was previously a radical defect: "No root in themselves:" "no oil in the vessel:" "They went out from us, because they were not of us." (Notes, Jer. 32:39—41. Ez. 3:20,21. Matt. 13:20—22. 22:11—14. 25:1—13. John 15:2,6—8. 1 John 2:18,19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. We must not allow even the hospitality of those who appear friendly, to interrupt us in our duty, or induce us to be unfaithful to the truth, or to the souls of men: though the contrary conduct will probably, on some occasions, draw on us the censure of rudeness or ingratitude.—It requires reiterated and particular instruction to bring men to understand the proper connexion of piety and mercy, in the observation of the sabbath; and the distinction between real works of necessity, and those which are only made so by habits of self-indulgence: and the "wisdom that is from above," is requisite to teach us such meek yet firm perseverance in well doing, amidst malicious and watchful opposers, as may stop their mouths, even when their hearts are not changed.—Ministers ought to copy Christ, in embracing every opportunity of introducing instructive discourse, in all companies to which they are admitted; and in taking occasion, even from men's follies and mistakes, to make useful remarks whenever any fair opening is given for them.—No disposition of the depraved heart of man is more odious and foolish, or more universal, than pride in its varied exercises. Yet the vain ambition of honour, which is not a man's due, exposes him to contempt even among competitors for the same distinctions; and they count him as a rival, whom they delight to degrade and mortify: whilst modesty commonly engages respect and attention. It is, indeed, far more honourable for a man to begin low, and to be unassuming, and to be advanced by the verdict and with the consent of others, than to assume a rank, and advance pretensions, to which he is singular in deeming himself entitled, and from which he is likely to be degraded with shame and contempt. But when we know our real character in the sight of God, and are made well acquainted with our own hearts, we shall proportionably be disinclined to aspire at the chief places, either in society or in the church, and shall be contented and thankful for the most obscure; and be made willing to see others honoured, and ourselves neglected and slighted in the comparison. This is in reality a far better way of being made useful and honourable, in the Lord's due time, than to aspire after high-sounding titles, or places of authority, popularity, and precedency; which cannot be coveted, without forgetting what poor, guilty, polluted, weak, and foolish creatures we are. And this forgetfulness tends to abasement and degradation, by the invariable rule of the Lord's dealings with his reasonable creatures.

V. 12—24. Would any unbiassed observer of mankind have supposed, that Christ had laid down such a rule for the conduct of all his disciples, as we here meet with? (Note, 12—14.) Who almost, whether he can or cannot afford it, does not make expensive feasts for his rich friends and relations? What large sums are often wasted in this manner, compared with the scanty pittance which is given to the poor! Yet what good can be expected from this ostentatious profusion, which is worthy to be put in competition with "a recompense at the resurrection of the just?" Whilst, therefore, so many prefer the vain commendation or customs of the world, or an interchange of festive indulgence, to the approbation of Christ; let us observe his precept of feasting "the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind," from love to him, and to them for his sake; and let us remember that it is peculiarly blessed to do good to those who cannot recompense us, and to labour in those services for which we receive nothing from man; (Note, 6:27—36, v. 35.) for the Lord has engaged himself by promises to recompense us, and his rewards are unspeakably most valuable.—Let us also consider the example of Christ, as it is a comment on this precept: he too has "made a great supper," by dying upon the cross for our sins, that he might rescue us from eternal destruction, and feast us with holy consolations, and substantial, enduring felicity. Was this rich provision made for the wise and the righteous? By no means: but for sinners, rebels, and enemies to God; for the "poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind." Indeed many are invited; yea, many are ready to say, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God!" But the poor in spirit, the broken-hearted sinner, alone will relish this spiritual feast: (Note, Matt. 5:3.) and while the servants, from age to age, are employed to invite guests, and to assure "them that all things are ready;" and that pardon, peace, grace, and eternal life are freely bestowed on all, who seek them by faith in the name of Christ: instead of thankfully accepting the invitation; even they, who do not proceed to greater instances of contempt and enmity, "begin with one consent to make excuse;"

and desire leave to continue in sin, at least for some time longer. They have no desire after this feast, or due regard to him who prepared it; and so are not fearful of being excluded: and thus any worldly engagement, amusement, or attachment, suffices as a pretence for "neglecting so great salvation!" Not only do men destroy their souls, for great secular advantages, or by gross outward sins; but they so misplace even lawful things, and act so carnally even in the ordinary affairs of life, that they perish by such matters as might have been attended to with far superior advantage, had they "sought first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."—Alas! that men should be so sensibly alive to their little temporal interests, to their credit among neighbours, and to the success of their worldly projects; and yet so careless, where the favour or wrath of God, and eternal happiness or misery, are at stake! But "the god of this world blinds their minds," and renders them insensible to the awful consequences of their procrastination, till the Lord gives sentence against them; "that," after the repeated invitations which they have rejected, "they shall never taste of his supper."—These things grieve the hearts of faithful ministers, who go and complain to their Lord, of the folly and perverseness of their hearers; but, though he is angry with obstinate unbelievers, he will not suffer the feast to be provided in vain: if the rich, the learned, the self-wise and self-righteous put it from them with neglect and disdain; he orders his servants to go without delay into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in thence the publicans and harlots. And as "yet there is abundance of room" and plenty of provisions; he orders some of them to go without the precincts of the visible church, to bring in the sinners of the Gentiles who have never yet heard of his name, till his house be filled with guests. Oh! that he would be pleased to inspire many ministers with that zeal and love, which would animate them to "compel sinners to come in;" and to be earnest, affectionate, and solemn, in calling the vilest of transgressors to repentance, and faith in Christ! But alas! some, mistaking God's secret decrees for their rule of duty, are thus restrained from exhorting, inviting, and persuading sinners at all: and far greater numbers are contented with a cold unmeaning harangue; as if they did not wish to be thought in earnest, in calling men to that feast, for which it is to be feared they themselves have no appetite. (Note, Prov. 1:21—33. P. O. 20—33. 9: Matt. 22:1—14.)

V. 25—35. Though men are bound to use every proper means with all assiduity, earnestness, and perseverance, God alone can prevail with sinners to partake of his salvation. Great multitudes may indeed attend on the gospel; and the opportunity should be embraced, of warning and instructing them with all plainness and faithfulness: but, unless they are taught of God supremely to value spiritual blessings, and to feel their perishing need of Christ, they will by no means become his true disciples. Indeed by far the greater number of teachers state this matter very conveniently; and by smooth words induce men to conclude that they may enjoy the world, and the privileges of the gospel, at the same time: and whilst "many follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of," it is almost become obsolete, (at least very unfashionable, even where some doctrines of the gospel are preached,) to declare the necessity of acting as if we "hated" our nearest relatives, or our own lives, when we aspire to be Christ's disciples. It is to be feared, many dream that they are interested in the cross of Christ, who were never willing to bear the cross for him; and who neither renounce their worldly interests, nor mortify their lusts, in order to follow him. But, unless we mean to build a Babel, as an eternal monument of our folly and madness, we must "count our cost" when we take up a profession of the gospel. It may cost us our lives; and it will inevitably expose us to losses, difficulties, and hardships: and if we be not prepared to give up iniquitous gain, forbidden indulgences, and the friendship of the world; and to bear ridicule and reproach, the displeasure or loss of friends, and many things of this kind; how should we be able to forsake all, and lay down our lives for Christ? (Note, Jer. 12:5,6. P. O. Heb. 12:4—8.) but while men shrink from the perils and sufferings of a warfare with sin and Satan; let them also reflect how dreadful their case must be, if they continue exposed to the wrath of God! If on any terms they have made their peace with him, they may bear, resist, and over come every thing, by his grace; but who can help them against his omnipotent indignation? These considerations, therefore, should not deter men from following Christ, but stir them up to seek help and grace from him to do it effectually and constantly; that they may not be as "salt, that has

May we then seek to be disciples indeed, and be careful not to grow slack in our profession, or afraid of the cross; that we may be the good salt of the earth, to season all around us with the savour of Christ, and of his heavenly truth!

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1, 2. Some expositors suppose our Lord to have been at this time beyond Jordan, on the borders of the Gentiles; that many of them attended his ministry; and that the term "sinners" is here meant of them: but this is highly improbable; for "he received and ate with" the "sinners" here mentioned; (2) but "he was made under the law," and perfectly fulfilled it; though he disregarded the traditions of the elders: and it was generally considered as a violation of the law, to eat with those who were uncircumcised, and did not observe the distinction of clean and unclean meats. Had he eaten with Gentiles, his apostles would hardly have scrupled it after his ascension, as they most evidently did. (Notes, Acts 10:9—16,27—33. 11:1—3.) Yet it is probable, that he ate with the Samaritans, when he stayed two days at Sychar: and accordingly we find that the apostles readily went among those Samaritans who embraced the gospel. But these were circumcised, and observed the distinction of meats; though they were heretics and schismatics, and abhorred by the Jews.—Our Lord was "sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel;" did he then "come to call the Gentiles" exclusively "to repentance?" (5:32.) Was Zaccheus a Gentile? (19:7—9.) Was St. Paul a Gentile before his conversion? or did Jesus come to save only Gentiles? (1 Tim. 1:15.)—In fine, the word "a sinner" is applied to our Lord himself; but did the Jews suppose him to be a Gentile? (John 9:16,24,25,31.)—The publicans, and other notorious sinners, however, in the neighbourhood, with one consent, came to hear our Lord's instructions; and not merely to gratify curiosity, or to obtain the cure of their diseases. Probably, many of them were touched with a sense of their need of repentance and forgiveness: and our Lord not only instructed them, but sat at table with them, without any scruple, as he had been used to do in other places. This excited the murmurs and reproaches of the Pharisees and scribes, who observed with astonishment and indignation, that he acted entirely contrary to their maxims. As these men were generally regarded to be oracles of wisdom and models of piety, their frown was likely to discourage the poor trembling sinners: but to prevent this effect, as well as to check and expose their arrogant spirit; Jesus vindicated his own conduct, and described the gracious dealings of God with sinners, in three parables; which all agree in many of the same great outlines, though they place the subject in different lights to make it the more clearly understood.—'Publicans, gross sinners, and heathens, were by the scribes and Pharisees judged unfit to be conversed with, even though it were with a design to reduce them from their evil courses; they thinking God had cast off the care of them, and had no design to grant them "repentance unto life:" whence they abhorred their company, as thinking it a defilement to be touched by them, and never would concern themselves to make them better. (5:30. Matt. 9:11. Acts 10:28. 11:18,19.)' Whitby. (Notes, 7:37—50. 19:1—10. Matt. 9:10—13.)

V. 3—7. "The lost sheep," in this emblem, represents the sinner, as departed from God, and exposed without help to manifold dangers and certain ruin, if not brought back to him; yet as utterly without either power or inclination to return. Christ is the Owner, or Shepherd, of his chosen and purchased flock, and counts them his property even when in their sinful state. (Note, John 10:14—18.) As a man would leave the rest of his flock, in the pastures of the wilderness, being comparatively safe, to go and seek one lost sheep; so Christ is particularly earnest in bringing home sinners to his church from their perilous wanderings; and he considers this as much his office, or employment, as taking care of those who are already brought back. The owner of the flock sought the lost sheep till he found it, and then "laid it on his shoulders rejoicing:" thus Christ, by his word and providence, seeks out the lost sinner, and by his Spirit overcomes his unwillingness to return to God; by his power he delivers him from the bondage of sin and Satan, and carries him above the temptations of this evil world: and he rejoices in thus bringing him back to the favour and service of God, by repentance, faith, and true conversion. (Marg. Ref. c—g. Notes, Ps. 23:1—3. 119:176. Is. 53:4—6. Ez. 34:11—16,23—31. Matt. 18:12—14. John 10:1—13,26—31. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 25.)—As he, who had found his lost sheep, might be supposed to call on his friends and neighbours to rejoice with him on that account, rather than because the other ninety-nine had not strayed; so our Lord declared, that "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth:" the Lord himself rejoices, and all his holy worshippers rejoice with him, on that account; even "more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance."—This may be differently explained. Angels are perfectly righteous and need no repentance: yet the repentance of one sinner on earth, taken in connexion with its causes and consequences, redounds more to the glory of God, and therefore causes more joy in heaven, than the continuance of angels in their primitive state of rectitude. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, Eph. 3:9—12.) Some have been preserved from that degree of outward vice and impiety, to which others have been left: but the conversion of the latter, being more unexpected and surprising, as well as the more signal display of divine power and mercy, may be considered as exciting far louder acclamations of joy and praise, than that of such as comparatively "needed no repentance."—Every Christian, at his first conversion, occasioned this joy in heaven; but it is the cause of renewed joy, when another and another is brought to repentance: and this joy is more sensibly felt and expressed, every time one more is added to the company of the redeemed, than it is on account of "the ninety and nine" who are already brought home, and have no further occasion for that entire repentance from dead works, which the newly awakened sinner exercises: even as a father rejoices more in the unexpected recovery of one son, who was given over for death, than in the health and safety of his other children, whom yet he loves with equal tenderness.—But doubtless our Lord intended more immediately to address the Pharisees, according to their own opinion of themselves. They proudly fancied that they needed no repentance; yet the conversion of one publican or harlot was far more pleasing and honourable to God, and matter of far greater joy in heaven, than the formality and decency of any number of those who yet thought themselves exclusively "the sheep of his pasture:" and the publican's tears of godly sorrow, and broken cries for mercy, were far more acceptable than all their long prayers and ostentatious austerities. V. 8—10. The purport of this parable is nearly the same with that of the preceding: it shows the value which Christ puts upon the souls of his chosen people. They are his property, the fruit of his toil and sufferings: and he will use suitable means and render them effectual, to find them out, and bring them home to his church: and then all who love him will be called on to rejoice with him on that account: so that "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth." The true repentance of a sinner implies his deliverance from eternal misery, and his being made an heir of everlasting felicity. It is a trophy of Christ's victory over the powers of darkness, and a blessed effect of his atoning sacrifice. A monument is thus raised up to the glory of divine mercy and grace, which shall continue to all eternity: a worshipper of God is added to his church, who will glorify him for ever: a man, before unprofitable and mischievous, and who would otherwise have served the cause of Satan during the rest of his days, is now made the disciple and servant of Jesus Christ, to do his will and promote his gospel, by his example, prayers, endeavours, and the improvement of all his talents during the residue of his life. As then angels love the Lord, and hate iniquity; as they are free from pride, enmity, and envy, and filled with benevolence; they must rejoice exceedingly with the divine Saviour, whenever they are made acquainted with a work of his grace, which is of such immense and everlasting importance, as even the repentance of one single sinner. All true Christians rejoice, and praise God, for the appearance of this happy change in the temper and conduct of any person within the circle of their acquaintance, in exact proportion to the degree of their humility, zeal, and love: these dispositions are perfect in the angels, and the gracious change may be fully certified to them; we may therefore conclude, that their acclamations and joyful praise will be proportionably fervent and rapturous, most honourable to God, and an accession to their own felicity. In this declaration the Pharisees might see, as in a glass, the hatefulness of their own temper and conduct: and nothing could be more suited to give encouragement to the poor sinners who came to hear our Lord's instructions. The good Shepherd himself rejoices over the lost sheep when found, and the Father over the returning prodigal; and therefore some expositors seem to confine the "joy in heaven" to God himself, who rejoices in the presence of his angels. But the good Shepherd called on all his friends to rejoice with him; and the whole family rejoiced when the prodigal returned: so that, doubtless, angels and "the spirits of just men made perfect," participate the joy of God our Saviour when one sinner repents; as it is intimated in each of these parables. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, 3—7. vv. 6,7,22—24.)—This consideration should inflame the zeal, and quicken the industry, of the spiritual shepherd, for the conversion of sinners; as knowing this is a work so highly acceptable to the God of heaven, and that for which he sent "the great Shepherd of the sheep" into the world.' Whitby. (Note, Jam. 5:19,20. *P. V. 11, 12. (Note, Matt. 21:28—32.) The preceding parables chiefly illustrate the importance of a sinner's conversion, in the judgment of God himself, and of his angels and servants: but this further shows the nature of repentance, and the most gracious reception, which the truly penitent, however vile they have been, experience from our merciful God and Father. In those, the exposed and helpless condition of lost sinners is represented; but in this, the rebellion and ingratitude of their conduct is exhibited. Many suppose that the Jews and Gentiles are represented by the two sons: but the occasion on which the parable was spoken evidently shows, that the Pharisees were primarily intended by "the elder son;" and the publicans, and other immoral and irreligious Jews, by the younger. The same distinction between formal and moral persons, and those of more scandalous lives, is found in every country, and the two companies include all, except the remnant of penitent believers. The situation, however, of the idolatrous nations, compared with that of the Jews; and the conversion of the former, with the indignation of the latter, might also be prophetically intended. —The case of "the younger son" is first and more largely described. We are led to consider him, as having been well educated, and kindly treated, by a pious, prudent, and affectionate father, in whose family he had every profitable indulgence: but, without cause, he ungratefully demanded "the portion of goods that fell to" his share. This accords to the foolish and perverse conduct of many children; who grow weary of the good regulations and subordinations of their parents' family, and want to be removed from under their rule and out of their sight; vainly supposing that they can manage better for themselves, than their parents do for them: and instead of being thankful for the persevering care and tenderness of their parents in former years, they think themselves entitled to a "portion of goods," as if they had a legal claim to it. But it also aptly describes the temper of sinners respecting God: notwithstanding his providential kindness and the reasonableness of his commands, they cast off all regard to his authority, and endeavour to break loose from the impressions of a religious education, if they have been favoured with one: they count themselves entitled to a large share of worldly possessions, and murmur if not thus indulged; and they foolishly imagine that they shall best enjoy themselves, when they most forget or rebel against God. —The father's division of his substance between his sons, may be considered as an illustration of his kindness, and an aggravation of the prodigal's guilt in leaving him: and it shows that God often indulges men in their carnal inclinations, that they may be more inexcusable in rebellion, and may know by experience the folly of their own choice.—It is said that there is a custom, or law, in the east, by which the son may demand his portion, in the lifetime of his father, who cannot legally refuse compliance. Nothing of this, however, is at all intimated in Scripture.

V. 13—16. It is next stated, that the younger son removed with all his property into a far country, as if he meant to traffic with it; but in fact that he might receive no more counsel or control from his father. This represents the prosperous sinner's increasing impiety and disregard of God: and the prodigal's "wasting his substance in riotous living," shadows forth the abuse which men make of the bounty of Providence, by spending it on their lusts, and the manner in which they often ruin their health, and shorten their lives, by excess. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) The prodigal is next described, as having "spent all:" and, a famine at the same time prevailing in the land, he was entirely deserted by his companions and flatterers, and began to be destitute. This shows the wasting transient nature of ungodly pleasure and prosperity, and the tendency of sin to produce misery: and also that the Lord often visits the sinner with additional afflictions, especially when he proposes to bring him to repentance. (Marg. Ref. t. Note, Hos. 2:6,7.)—But the prodigal was at this time too stout-hearted to return home, disgraced and impoverished, and submit to his offended father: and therefore he hired himself as a servant to a person in that distant country, who "sent him into his fields to feed swine." This was a mean employment in itself; but among the Jews, to whom those animals were ceremonially unclean, it might be considered as the greatest debasement imaginable, especially to one who had been brought up in affluence. Yet, as if the hardship and disgrace had been too little, he was scarcely allowed to satisfy the cravings of his appetite with the husks, or mast, the coarse wild fruits, on which the swine fed; though for want of other food, he earnestly desired it: so that he was reduced to the danger even of perishing by hunger.—Thus the sinner, when suffering under the effects of his transgressions, instead of repenting and humbling himself before God, often plunges still deeper into the basest crimes, and sells himself to Satan, that most cruel of masters, to work iniquity of the most scandalous and degrading kind: and yet sometimes can hardly obtain the meanest sustenance; and grows more and more despicable and miserable, having nothing but destruction before his eyes!

V. 17—19. Having viewed the prodigal, in his most abject state of servitude and misery as ready to perish; we are next led to consider his recovery from it. This began "when he came to himself;" he had been infatuated and frantic, and had acted as a man bereft of understanding, having been 20 And he arose, and came to his father. [i]But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, [k]and fell on his neck, and kissed him.

21 And the son said unto him, [l]Father, I have sinned [m]against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.

28 And [a]he was angry, and would not go in: [b]therefore came his father out and entreated him.

blind both to his interest and obligations; but, by means of his afflictions, he was brought to serious consideration, and to form a more just estimate of his own conduct and situation.—'He who lives a sinful life is beside himself: for, being a rational creature, and having a judgment and conscience to direct his actions; he acts against his reason, his judgment, and his conscience.' Whithy. But in conversion, the Lord opens his eyes, and convinces him of sin; and then he views himself and every object around him in a new light, and so forms a contrary judgment respecting almost every thing, from what he had before done. (Marg. Ref. a.) The first thought that occurred to the prodigal, when "come to himself," related to the plenty in which his father's menial servants lived, and his own misery, compared even with their condition. Though numerous, they had "bread enough and to spare;" whilst he, who once lived as a son in that happy family, and might still have done so had it not been for his own sin and folly, was perishing with hunger at a distance from home! Thus the convinced sinner perceives that his own wickedness has reduced him to a state of misery and extreme peril, from which he cannot escape, except he return to God, whose meanest servant is happier than he.—Accordingly, the prodigal resolved to "Arise, and go to his Father," and, without attempting to excuse or palliate his conduct, or cast any blame on others, as is usual in such cases, (Notes, Gen. 3:12,13. Prov. 28:13.) to acknowledge that in his ungrateful disobedience to him, he had sinned against the God of heaven also; that he was not deserving to be admitted into his family as a son: and entreating his father not to leave him to perish, but to employ him in the work, and to give him the maintenance, of a hired servant. And in forming this resolution he drew his whole encouragement from the recollection of his father's goodness, which at the same time aggravated his own criminality.—In like manner, convinced sinners are led to hope in the mercy of that God, against whom they have rebelled; and are excited to return to him, with unreserved and ingenuous confessions and earnest supplications: and whenever brought to this spirit, they may address him as a kind Father, though conscious that they are unworthy to be called his children. (Marg. Ref. c—h. Notes, Lev. 26: 40—42. 2 Chr. 33:12,13. Ps. 51:3. Jer. 3:12—15. 1 John 1:8—10.)

V. 20, 21. According to his determination, the prodigal, not regarding himself bound by his engagement to his cruel master, set out on his journey home; and did not delay, or yield to weariness and discouragement, till he came thither: though in such a case we may conceive how he must be distressed with fears, lest his father should reject or upbraid him; as well as have very many hardships to endure. But when he was yet at a distance, his father, (who is represented as regretting his absence, and longing for his return,) saw and knew him; and, forgetting all his son's provocations, yea, and overlooking his own years and dignity, being full of "compassion," he "ran and fell on his neck and kissed him;" expressing his joy at his arrival, and his entire reconciliation to him. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, 2 Chr. 33:11,12,18,19. Job 33:27—30. Jer. 31:18—20.) Whilst the son, being made the more ashamed of his own misconduct by his father's kindness, acknowledged his guilt and unworthiness, in the words which he had premeditated: save that he omitted the latter clause; either interrupted by his kind father, or not counting it necessary, seeing he was welcomed as a son.—Thus the penitent sinner quits the bondage of Satan, and returns to God by faith and prayer, amidst a variety of fears and difficulties; and the Lord readily meets him with unexpected tokens of his forgiving love. These conduce still farther to humble his heart, though they inspire him with more confidence of hope, in the mercy of his gracious Lord.—'After sin is pardoned,' (as well as before,) 'it becomes the sinner ingenuously to acknowledge and confess it.' Whithy. (Marg. V. 22—24. While the prodigal was confessing his guilt, the father ordered the servants to bring "the best robe," or "the principal robe;" that he might be clothed as it became his beloved son to be; and to "put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet;" and then to prepare a feast for him and them, that they might rejoice together over one who had been as dead, and lost to his family and friends, but was now returned alive and well. Ref. p. Notes, Deut. 33:24,25. Eph. 6:14—17, v. 15.) V. 25—32. In the subsequent part of this parable the character of the Pharisees is delineated, as to the most prominent feature of it. Had they been as righteous as they thought themselves, their conduct towards the publicans and sinners would have been very unreasonable. (Note, 1,2.) On this ground our Lord took the opportunity of expostulating with them; as on other occasions he exposed their hypocrisy and wickedness.—The elder son is represented as having been in the field employed in labour: but when he returned, and heard the unexpected expressions of festive rejoicing, he inquired the reason; and being told on what account the feast was made, "he was angry, and would not go in." This represented the Pharisees, though not them alone. They were exact in external duties, but proud of their goodness, they deemed themselves the peculiar favourites of heaven, and could not endure that publicans and abandoned sinners should receive any encouragement. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Notes, 7:37—39. 18:9—14. 19:1—10, v. 7.) They abhorred them, not only when living in sin, but even when they appeared penitent: they would not eat with them, and deemed it very criminal in Jesus that he would: and they rejected the gospel with the greatest disdain, because such worthless persons were admitted to share its blessings; as the Jews also did afterwards, when the Gentiles were called into the church. Thus, when angels, and the Lord of angels, and all the friends of God, were rejoicing over penitent and pardoned sinners; they envied, murmured, and raged!—The father is next described, as going out to entreat his son to come in; but he answered with boastings and complaints. He had done the work of a servant for many years, and had never at any time disobeyed his father's commandment; yet his father had never given him so much as a kid, that he might feast with his friends: but now that "this his son," (whom he disdained to acknowledge as a brother,) was returned home, after having consumed his wealth, and impoverished the family as far as he could, by debauchery, he "had killed for him the fatted calf!" This represents the condescension of the Lord, in persuading even proud objectors to accept his salvation, and the arrogant manner in which such invitations and persuasions are often received. The Pharisees suppose that there was and [d]yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:

30 But as soon as [e]this thy son was come, which hath [f]devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf.

31 And he said unto him, [g]Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine.

32 It [h]was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: [i]for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

great merit in their strict and constant services; and, because they were not guilty of the outward scandals which they charged on the publicans, they thought themselves exempt from all blame: yet they had never experienced those joys in religion, to which the penitent sinner professed to be admitted. (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, Matt. 20:1—16, v. 12. 25:24—30, vv. 24,25.)—It is well known that the Jews in general were of the same spirit, respecting the converted Gentiles; and numbers, in every age, object to the gospel, and its preachers, on similar grounds.—To this proud, rude, ungrateful reply, the father meekly answered, that, as his son, he "was ever with him," sharing the provisions of his family, and continually receiving tokens of his favour: and that he was the acknowledged heir of all his substance, though no feast had expressly been made on his account, because he had never left home. But, that it was meet that they should all rejoice over his "brother," who had so unexpectedly been reclaimed from his evil courses, and restored to the family, as one that was alive from the dead. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) Some expositors have been greatly perplexed in applying this latter part of the parable: yet the difficulty will vanish, if we advert to the general scope of it. Had it been true, that the Pharisees were the favourites of heaven, and had always been obedient and deserving, their present privileges would have been continued to them, and their future inheritance secure, and undiminished by the favour shown to the publicans. The same would have been the case with the Jews, notwithstanding the calling of the Gentiles, if they had been indeed the children of believing Abraham. So that they could not be deprived of the blessing, except they were found among unbelievers and hypocrites. In the mean time, it was meet that all the servants of God should rejoice with him over the repentance and reconciliation of the poor publicans and harlots, by which his name would be glorified, and immortal souls saved. They were of the same nature and nation with the Pharisees, who disdained them; and the less hope there was of their conversion, the more heartily it ought to be rejoiced in. Thus our Lord closed the subject, not seeing good at that time to push the argument further against the Pharisees; whom he left to contemplate, as in a glass, the unreasonableness of their own conduct; that they might be induced to give up their objections, and to apply for a share in the blessings of his gospel: even as the refractory son was invited to come in and partake of the feast. The elder son is not represented to have returned any answer to his father, and it is not said that he went in, or that he did not; we may therefore suppose our Lord to mean, that they ought to be satisfied with this statement of the matter, and that some of them would be so: but that others would remain sullen and untractable, after all that could be said to convince them. 'The elder son, in this parable, representeth not the just, or righteous: for they are not angry either that sinners do return to God, or that he graciously entertains them when they do so; but rather are industrious to bring them home to him and rejoice at their return.' Whitby.—With Harlots. (30) 'They could never say, that he' (Jesus) 'was a friend to prostitutes: because it does not appear, that such persons ever came to Christ, or that he, in the way of his ministry, ever came to them.' Dr. Adam Clarke, Note, Luke 8. Dr. Clarke, however, allows, that the 'prodigal son was among harlots.' I trust he did not, in his zealous defence of Mary Magdalene from the unjust charges brought against her, recollect at the moment the conclusions which might readily be deduced from this statement.—Are the harlots (πορναι) so immensely more criminal and hopeless, than their male associates and often seducers, (πορνοι,) that while one of the latter was selected by our Lord himself for the encouraging pattern of our gracious God's ready mercy to the penitent, however vile their previous character; the former are to be considered merely as the objects of his frown and studied disregard?

(Matt. 21:32,33.)—The statement given in the note, on which I make these remarks, is certainly suited to sink those wretched women, of this description, who may read it, into deep despondency; and also to discourage efforts for rescuing them from their abject condition. Nay, it seems to censure the very charities instituted for that purpose. I hope, therefore, that the learned writer will, on a revisal, modify the statement which he has made.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. When the chief of sinners draw near to hear the gospel, they should be addressed with compassion, as well as plainness of speech, and never be driven away with contempt and upbraidings: nor should we shun to go among them for their good, however the self-wise and self-righteous may murmur or revile. Nay, it is reasonable for us to bestow peculiar attention to them, as the lost sheep excites the shepherd's chief regard; and his labour in seeking, and joy at finding it, are far greater than he exercises about the sheep which remain in the pasture. Indeed we "all have been as sheep going astray," and he "on whom were laid the iniquities of us all," comes to seek us, and rejoices in bringing us back to his chosen flock: and he requires all who love him, to rejoice over every instance of this abundant grace. Let us then leave it to those who think that "they need no repentance," to refuse their tribute of joyful praise on such occasions. We know, if we be indeed true believers, that there is joy in heaven over every weeping penitent, more than over ninety and nine formal professors of Christianity.—But shall the Lord do so much, and employ so many means and instruments to bring sinners home to himself; shall Christians, ministers, angels, yea, the Lord of angels, judge the repentance of one sinner a matter of such high importance, and cordial rejoicing; and shall sinners themselves not think it worth while to bestow any pains in seeking the inestimable blessing! Shall they not desire to cause holy joy in heaven by repenting, who have excited a malignant joy in hell by their crimes? What immense encouragement also does this assurance give the weeping penitent, in coming to the compassionate Saviour! We may likewise conclude, that the powers of darkness will never rejoice in the final ruin of those over whom angels have thus rejoiced: and we may be excited to employ our labours, and pour out our prayers with all earnestness, for the conversion of sinners around us; for if one only should be rescued by our means from destruction, and brought into the way of everlasting felicity, it will incalculably overpay all the labours of our whole lives.—Nor should we yield to enfeebling discouragement, when our zealous labours seem apparently but little successful: for perhaps, while we complain and grieve, that we "labour in vain, and spend our strength for nought;" and while others may suppose we are doing little or nothing; angels are rejoicing over one and another, by our means brought to true repentance. In this, as far as we can know it, we are bound to be joyful and thankful, while we take encouragement to labour and pray with redoubled earnestness, for more extensive usefulness.

V. 11—16. Some men evidently run greater lengths in rebellion and impiety than others; yet we may all of us discern several features of our own character, in that of the prodigal son. Have we not counted the service of God a burden, and his commands and restraints grievous? Have we not coveted a worldly portion, and secretly desired to be independent of God? Have we not murmured when outward abundance has been withheld, and abused the blessings bestowed upon us? Have we not gone far from God, and endeavoured to forget him, when indulging our appetites and passions? While many have been ruined by prosperity in sin, may not some of us be thankful, that we have been afflicted and disappointed? that our expected enjoyments have been embittered, the materials of them torn from us, and our own iniquities made to correct us? Yet even in this case, have not some of us, have not numbers, plunged still deeper into wickedness, and become more entirely the servants of Satan, in the very midst of sufferings?—Let us also reflect on the fading nature of earthly enjoyments; the instability of prosperity; and the unfaithfulness and unfeeling selfishness of companions in vice, who readily leave those to perish whom they once flattered and caressed for their own base purposes. And what a vile master is Satan, who allures men by the hopes of sensual and worldly pleasure; and then reduces very great numbers to the most abject penury, disease, contempt, and wretchedness, leaving them thus to perish unpitied and unlamented! But the change in the prodigal's situation, when, from the credit and indulgences of his father's family, he was reduced to "feed swine," and want even husks to satisfy his hunger, but feebly shadows forth the fall of man by sin, from the image, favour, and enjoyment of God, to be a condemned rebel, a slave of Satan, an heir of hell, and "a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction." Yet alas! how few are sensible that this is their real state and character!

V. 17—24. Happy are they, who, by means of any afflictions, are made to see the madness and folly of their rebellion against God! With what new eyes do they then begin to behold the divine character and law, their own obligations and conduct, their interest and duty, their state and prospects! The sinner, when "he is come to himself," is made sensible

AND he said also unto his disciples, There was [a]a certain rich man which had [b]a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had [c]wasted his goods.

2 And he called him, and said unto him, [d]How is it that I hear this of thee? [e]give an account of thy stewardship; [f]for thou mayest be no longer steward.

3 Then the steward [g]said within himself, [h]What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: [i]I cannot dig; [k]to beg I am ashamed.

4 I am [l]resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship they may receive me into their houses.

5 So he called every one of [m]his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord?

6 And he said, An hundred [*]measures of oil. And he said unto him, [n]Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty.

that he is a wretch undone; and that the meanest of those servants of God, whom he formerly despised, is happy compared with him. He discovers that there is no hope of escaping destruction, except by repentance, and returning unto God through Jesus Christ, and by faith in his blood; the riches of whose goodness and mercy give him his sole encouragement to repent, and hope for pardon: he sees and confesses the greatness of his guilt; and its manifold aggravations, which before he palliated, excused, or gloried in: he allows himself to be utterly unworthy of those blessings, which from the goodness of God he enjoyed and ungratefully despised; and he is rendered willing to submit to any abasement, or self-denial, if he may be admitted into the number of the Lord's servants, and be preserved from impending destruction. Nor does he rest in recollections, or good purposes to be realized at some future period: (Note, Ps. 119:57—63.) without delay, he arises from sloth and despondency; he breaks his league with sin; encounters difficulties with resolution and perseverance; "ceases to do evil, learns to do well;" uses the means of grace, and endeavours to mortify sinful propensities and perform self-denying duties, even upon a peradventure that the Lord may have mercy upon him: and he proceeds in this course, though harassed with fears, lest his sins should be unpardonable, or lest he should finally be rejected. But when our gracious Lord has thus humbled sinners, and led them to justify him by condemning themselves, to submit to his will, and to seek mercy in his appointed way; he will not delay to come to their relief and comfort. He sees all their remorse and anguish, he witnesses their groans and tears, he hears and accepts their broken petitions and confessions; and he never upbraids those who loathe and abhor themselves. This genuine repentance is increased by every fresh discovery of the Lord's goodness and mercy; every token of forgiveness renders the heart more contrite, godly sorrow more ingenuous, and confessions of guilt more unreserved. Thus a blessed reconciliation takes place between an offended God and a heinous transgressor of his laws: and while the broken-hearted penitent feels himself unworthy of the least favour, his heavenly Father puts him in full possession of all the blessings of his salvation, "seals him with the Spirit of adoption," and comforts him beyond his largest hopes. Thus he is encouraged, animated, and even constrained by redeeming love, to walk with pleasure in the ways of holy obedience: and his services will be as much superior to those of formal Pharisees, as his joy in the Lord exceeds their conception and experience. Then angels and saints rejoice, that the lost sinner is found, that the dead is raised, and that the rebel is reconciled.—And let it be here hinted, that this is an example, which parents especially are called to imitate in their conduct towards their children; when, having been even very disobedient and profligate, they "come to themselves," desire to return to their duty, and to obtain forgiveness of the past.

V. 25—32. How hateful must that disposition be, in a sinner, which leads him to repine at an event that fills all the holy inhabitants of heaven with rejoicing! which excites him to despise and abhor those, for whom the Saviour shed his precious blood, who are the objects of the Father's special choice, and the temples of the Holy Spirit! and which induces a worm on earth to disdain him as a brother, whom the God of heaven has numbered among his children. (Notes, Acts 9:17—22, v. 17.)—It is very wrong to despair of those who are living in the most abandoned profligacy and impiety.—Who can tell, but that they may be brought to repentance? For "where sin hath abounded, grace much more abounds." But to disdain those who actually repent, believe, rejoice in God, and live to his glory, because of those crimes which are now "buried in the depths of the sea;" must spring from pride, self-preference, and ignorance of a man's own heart.—Where this disposition is habitual and allowed, it far more than counterbalances all external decency of conduct: and he who boasts of his unremitted obedience, as if he "had never transgressed God's commandments;" who complains of the Lord's dealings with him, as if he were not suitably rewarded; who grudges the favour shown to returning prodigals, and disdains their company; and who quarrels with the gospel itself, or with those who preach it, for giving them encouragement: this man is of a more hateful disposition than the profligates whom he abhors, and as far from the spirit of Christ and the temper of angels, as the most abandoned debauchee on earth; however moral he may be, and exact in forms of godliness. But a degree of the same temper may be found in men of a better character. Even believers are sometimes apt to limit the mercies of God, and to give up as hopeless, those who are abandoned to crimes, from which they themselves have been graciously preserved. Many who have been long preserved from any remarkable inconsistency of conduct, seem to have little tenderness for those who have been foiled by temptation, even when they give clear evidence of deep repentance.—Others look with suspicion on such of their brethren, however deep their repentance, or however unexceptionable their conduct, who have been reclaimed from very immoral practices; and sometimes they are even surprised or offended, to see them assured of their acceptance, and rejoicing in the Lord! In these, and numberless other ways, the remains of the Pharisee may be discerned; and every feature of his countenance is most hateful, in one who must be saved by unmerited grace, or else perish for evermore. If a man be a true Christian, his present privileges and future inheritance will not be diminished, by the admission of the lowest profligates to the same felicity: but the prevalence of self-preference, on any ground whatever; of contempt, of envy, and such other malignant tempers, gives proportionable ground to suspect that a man is a stranger to the true grace of God.—But how adorable is the condescension of the Lord, in thus continuing to reason the case with perverse worms of the earth, and in beseeching them to accept the blessings of his salvation! Happy will it be for those, who are at length won over, thankfully to accept of his invitation, and to come to the feast and rejoicing, of which repenting prodigals participate, and in which adoring angels join! But as for those who persist in their enmity and contempt, their boastings will speedily be silenced, and their portion allotted them "with the devil and his angels;" with whom alone they accord in repining, when "those that were dead are alive again, and those who were lost are found."

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1—8. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:1,2.) This parable was addressed to the disciples, but in the hearing of the Pharisees (14). The "rich man" represented the Lord himself, the sole Proprietor of all things; "the steward" marked out the man who is intrusted with worldly riches and misemploys them, or with any thing, of which a good or a bad use may be made; as the members and senses of our body, especially the tongue; the faculties of our souls, health, strength, genius, learning, eloquence, authority, and influence; as well as our property, and every part of it, however small. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, Matt. 25:14—18.) Every man is in many things the steward of the Lord: all his possessions and endowments are intrusted to him, that he may with them glorify God and do good to men; and an account will soon be required of the use which he has made of them.—The steward, in this parable, "was accused to his lord that he had wasted his goods;" he had employed his master's property on his own indulgence, or suffered it to be embezzled by others, or wasted it by bad management. Thus men spend their riches in gratifying their appetites, pride, vanity, or curiosity, they lavish them on those who do not want them, and in such expenses as tend to encourage vice or folly: in short, they do not obey the commandments, and seek the honour of God, in using them; and they stand accused of wasting their Lord's property, though they neither amass wealth by rapine and injustice, nor hoard it penuriously; nay, though they obtain a high reputation for generosity: for that must be wasted, which is spent to no good purpose. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 14:12—14. 15:13—16. Matt. 25:19—30.)—The lord is next described as expostulating with the steward, who could neither deny the charge, nor excuse himself; and was therefore ordered to make out his accounts, and recede from the stewardship. This teaches us, that men will not, when called to account, be able to vindicate or excuse their waste, or improper expenditure of worldly things, and that death will shortly turn every man out of his stewardship. (Marg. Ref. d—f.) —When the steward heard the decisive sentence, of which he knew there would be no reversal, he considered in what manner he might so employ his present advantages, that they would stand him in stead after he had been dismissed from his place: otherwise he foresaw that his case would be very wretched; as he had never been accustomed, and was not able "to dig," or to get his living by hard labour; and he was ashamed to beg his bread after having lived in credit and plenty. This suggests some idea of the most wretched state of ungodly men, when "put out of their stewardship" by death. (Marg. Ref. g—k.)—Accordingly the steward devised a plan well suited to his purpose, and consistent with his character; determining to seduce his lord's debtors to concur in defrauding him, for their own advantage. By this measure he could, at his lord's expense, confer an obligation on them; and, being induced to become accomplices in the fraud, they would be restrained from informing against him: yet if they should refuse to give him assistance in his distress, he would have them in his power; and, as a desperate man, who had nothing to lose, he could inform against them, to the great injury of their character and property. Thus he made himself sure, that they would, one after another, entertain him in their houses, or provide for him some other method of subsistence. He therefore called them to him separately, and ordered one of them to give a note of hand, as we say, for half of what he really owed, instead of one for the whole; and another, with the deduction of one-fifth, and so to the others. (Marg. Ref. l—q.)—When this project came to light, his "lord commended the unjust steward;" (not for his iniquity, but for his policy:) he could not deny that it was a well-concerted plan of providing against the time of approaching distress; and in this respect alone is it proposed for our imitation: for our Lord added, that "the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." (Marg. Ref. r—t. Note, Eph. 5:8—14.) Worldly men, who make temporal things their primary object, are more prudent in respect of their present interests, than "the children of light," the people of God, in respect of their eternal concerns. In the choice of their object they are emphatically foolish: but in the selection of means, in assiduity and perseverance, in subordinating every other concern to the favourite pursuit, and rendering every thing subservient to it; in politic contrivances to prevent disappointment, to get over untoward circumstances, and to educe advantages from them; in these and various other particulars, they are exceedingly "wise in their generation:" yea, far wiser even than real believers, who are not so singly given up to the pursuit of their great object, nor so active, sagacious, and unremitting in the choice and use of means, in order to the attainment of it. Much more then, are they wiser than men in general are about their religious concerns; or than professed Christians are in improving their advantages.—'The Lord seems in this place to teach us, that the good things pertaining to this present life were granted to us by God; not that we should, as proprietors, spend them according to our own will; but that we should dispose of them, as intrusted to us by the Lord, in entire faithfulness. But men, especially those to whom the greatest abundance is committed, are used to abuse them in luxuriously gratifying themselves and others. Hence it comes to pass, that the Lord, no longer enduring this waste, justly determines to deprive us, as bad stewards, of our stewardship; either by taking our abused goods from us, or calling us, by terminating our lives, to his tribunal. But the proper way of averting this doom, procuring the continuance of our stewardship, and obtaining the means of greater beneficence, is, to make amends to the poor, by a charitable use of them. Thus it will come to pass, that God, perceiving that we more properly use these perishing things, will count us worthy of more valuable endowments.' Beza.—The name annexed to this quotation, is a sufficient pledge that nothing inconsistent with the doctrines of salvation by grace, and justification by faith alone, was intended. But it proves, that the first reformers considered many practical instructions, and even a kind of language in inculcating them, consistent with these doctrines, of which many at present would scarcely admit.

V. 9-13. From the preceding parable, our Lord took occasion to counsel his disciples to "make to themselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness:" that is, of those worldly riches which men idolize, as if they worshipped a deity called Mammon; and in getting, keeping, or spending of which, they commit all kind of unrighteousness. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, Matt. 6:24. 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10.) Some indeed interpret the expression, of the deceitfulness of riches, which impose upon those who expect happiness from them: and the clause, "the Mammon of unrighteousness," afterwards called, "the unrighteous Mammon:" is exactly similar to that before rendered "the unjust steward," which is literally, "the steward of unrighteousness."—The disciples of Christ, however, are directed to use riches, in "making to themselves friends;" that is, to expend them in acts of piety and charity, that many, being benefited by them, may pray for blessings on them as their benefactors. This alludes to the steward's failing of his former resources, by being discharged from his place; yet, "having made himself friends" by his use of his master's property, he was received into their houses. Thus when the believer "shall fail," and be removed from his stewardship by death; those whom he has made his friends by his charitable assistance, "will receive him into everlasting habitations." Not that this will in any measure merit that blessed recompense, or that the poor whom he has relieved can have the disposal of it; or that all whom he has relieved were pious persons, or all removed to heaven: but, as the cries of the oppressed and neglected poor will testify against unfaithful stewards to their condemnation; so the prayers of widows and orphans, for their pious benefactors, will testify for them, that they were faithful; and such believers as have died before them, may be considered as standing ready to welcome their benefactors to their everlasting habitations, when they quit this world. But as the most of Christ's disciples were then, and generally are, comparatively poor; they might think themselves unconcerned in this exhortation: and therefore he assured them, that if any man were "faithful in a very little," and consulted the will and honour of his Lord in the use of it, he would as certainly be accepted and rewarded, as if much had been committed to him; and the same disposition of mind would also render him faithful, if he should afterwards receive more. On the other hand, he, who was unjust in the least, spending even small sums upon his own vanity and indulgence, or wasting them through improvidence, and thus robbing God and the poor, would as certainly be condemned, as if he had been an unfaithful steward in abusing a larger property; and the same temper of mind would render him unjust in much, if it were committed to him. Indeed if men were unfaithful in "the unrighteous mammon, who would commit to their trust the true riches?" "The true riches" signify those blessings, which ennoble and satisfy the soul for ever: faith gives the sinner a title to these riches, and grace is the earnest of them and meetness for them; but faith and grace always render a man proportionably "faithful in the unrighteous mammon." If therefore a man spend his riches upon himself, or hoard them in avarice; what evidence can he have that he is an heir of God through Christ? Or what reason to expect, that God will give him that eternal felicity?—The verse indeed may signify, that they who were not faithful, as stewards of this world's riches, were improper persons to be made "stewards of the mysteries of God," to whom are committed the true riches, that they "may make many rich."—If, however, any persons were unfaithful in the things intrusted to them for a time, and of which an account must be rendered; how could they expect the Lord to give them at last an inheritance to be their own for ever, by an unalienable tenure? For what prudent man would give an estate to his steward, when he had been dishonest and unfaithful to the trust which had been reposed in him? (Marg. Ref. a—h.) This application of the parable, our Lord closed by repeating a solemn ἀγαπήσει ne will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

V. 14, 15. The Pharisees were addicted to covetousness, in pronortion as they desired to be thought exempt from licentiousness. (Notes, 1,2. Matt. 5:27,28,31,32.) They were "lovers of money," and often got it by extortion and injustice; and they either spent it in self-indulgence, or hoarded it for themselves, and their families. When therefore they heard our Lord discourse in this manner on the use of riches, they treated his instructions with the utmost derision and contempt; sneering at him, 'as a visionary, who did not understand human life, or only appeared to despise the world, because (as they supposed) it was out of his reach.' Doddridge. But he calmly replied to their disdain, that they indeed "justified themselves" by various plausible pretences, and preserved a fair appearance before men; but "God knew their hearts," which were full of hypocrisy, pride, and wickedness: and, though their forms, austerities, superstitions, and traditions were highly esteemed "among men," as if they were of great excellency; yet they were an "abomination in the sight of God."—This is also the case with a variety of endowments, dispositions, and achievements, which men "highly esteem," but which God abhors: such, for instance, is the thirst for glory, the ambition of conquest, the desire of revenge, called a quick sense of honour; the disposition to grasp after riches as the grand object, if not attended with gross injustice or excessive penuriousness; and a lavish generosity, though not directed to any valuable purpose. In these and innumerable other instances, God abhors what man highly esteems.

V. 16—18. The Pharisees were very zealous for the ceremonial law, as well as for their own traditions; and they opposed Christ, supposing that his doctrine was contrary to it: but he intimated to them, that a more spiritual dispensation was about to be introduced. The law, and the prophets who explained and enforced the law, continued in full force, as the sole rule of faith and practice, till John the forerunner of the Messiah began his ministry; since that time "the kingdom of God had been preached;" and though the Pharisees opposed it, yet numbers were earnestly pressing into it, and breaking their way through every obstruction, that they might share its invaluable privileges. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, Matt. 11:12—15.) They ought not, however, to suppose, that this new dispensation would interfere with the law of Moses; for it would be "easier for heaven and earth to pass away," than for one tittle of that law to fail of answering its intended purposes. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 5:17—20.) The ceremonial law would not fail of being accomplished, in that great Antitype which it prefigured; and the moral law would be magnified by his obedience unto death, and established in its full authority by his religion, as well as vindicated from corrupt interpretations. (Note, Rom. 3:29—31, v 31.)

But what they contended for as "the law" was frequently a perversion of it. This our Lord showed in one instance, which has been before considered; (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:3—9. Mark 10:2—12.) for in this matter the real meaning of the moral law was contrary to the doctrine, which they grounded on a misinterpretation of a judicial regulation, a "permission for the hardness of their heart." So that, while they imposed on the people by an apparent zeal about the law, they were in fact supplanting its authority, and perverting its meaning, by their traditions.

V. 19—21. Our Lord here illustrates more fully the guilt, and folly, nay madness, of men's wasting riches on self-indulgence, by a parable or description, which is interesting and affecting in the highest degree: a parable indeed it must be, as to many of its circumstances; yet in its grand outlines it is doubtless continually verified. The "rich man," here described, is not charged with having acquired his wealth by iniquity: and though he was clothed in the most costly attire, and lived in splendour, luxury, and jovial mirth, every day; it is not said that he ruined his family, or defrauded his creditors. Nor is he accused of being an adulterer, a drunkard, or a blasphemer, or even a glutton, though often called, 'the rich glutton.' He is represented as a Jew, "of the stock of Abraham," and therefore may be conceived to have had "a form of godliness;" and he was so far from being a miser, that he kept a noble house and an elegant table, and it may be supposed entertained his guests in a most hospitable manner. But he was "an unfaithful steward, who wasted his Lord's goods," neither using them to his glory, nor to the real advantage of mankind. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, 1—8. 12:15—21.) However honourable he might therefore be in the world's estimation, (15) he was not deemed worthy of a name in the word of God: while that honour was conferred on "a certain poor man" who lay at his gate, and was called Lazarus, which some explain to mean Helpless, and others God my Helper; and in either construction it suited both his case and his character. He was without help among men; but he trusted in God, who was his Helper. This man, having no power to labour, was supported by begging. "He could not dig, but to beg he was not ashamed:" and he was laid at the rich man's gate, that he might move his compassion. He was not only destitute, but covered with grievous ulcers; and he "desired to be fed with the crumbs," or the refuse broken victuals, which fell from the rich man's table, such as were either thrown away or eaten by the dogs. (Note, Matt. 15:25—28, v. 27.) It is not indeed said, that none were given him, yet it is strongly implied that his hunger was not satisfied. At the same time he was grievously diseased, and had no surgeon or nurse, to dress, or ointment to mollify, or even garments to cover, his sores; (Note, Job 2:7,8.) so that "the dogs came, and licked them," as more compassionate than their master, who probably chose to keep them for his pleasure or pride, rather than sustain a poor suffering fellow-creature of the same race, as well as of the same nature, with himself.

had not been the great object of his care, so no account is given how it was disposed of: the survivors, for their own sakes, would put it somewhere out of the way, where it would sleep till the resurrection. But angels, who are all "ministering spirits sent forth to minister unto the heirs of salvation," waited round him in his dying hours, and when he resigned his spirit they conveyed it "into Abraham's bosom." (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, John 13:18—30, vv. 23,25. Heb. 1:13,14.) The joys of heaven are here represented as a feast; Abraham "the father of the faithful" is placed, as it were, at the head of the table: so that "Abraham's bosom" denotes a place in heaven near to that distinguished patriarch, and intimates that the poor man was an eminent believer, a saint of superior excellency. About the same time the rich man also died, for death is no respecter of persons: and as he had indulged and decorated his body to the neglect of his soul, so he had a funeral suited to his rank. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) According to modern customs, in that silliest of all vanities, we may imagine his poor lifeless clay lying in state, surrounded with all the appendages of nobility; and then after a proper time for the display of this ostentation, conveyed with a pompous procession to a magnificent tomb, with great attendance and distinction. We may suppose, that some venal orator would deliver a fulsome panegyric on his noble birth, honourable titles and achievements, distinguished virtues, and princely generosity; and at length that the sepulchre would be adorned with some inscription replete with adulation. But all this time his soul, all of him that could feel or reflect, was "in hell," in the place of separate spirits, condemned to torment and misery. In this dreadful state "he lifted up his eyes," which before he had shut against the truth of his case and character, and discovered his own misery when it was become too late to escape it. Among other objects, he is represented as seeing Abraham afar off, and poor despised Lazarus reclining on his bosom, enjoying the most perfect rest and most exquisite satisfaction: and this view of Lazarus's felicity, joined to the dreadful reverse which himself had experienced, must add to his inward anguish and torture. (Marg. Ref. l—n.)

V. 24—26. It is not needful to determine, whether condemned spirits actually know or see what takes place in the realms of bliss: the representation is intended to show the hopeless misery, to which they are reduced.—The Jews were prone to confide in their relation to Abraham, even though not partakers of his faith: (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. John 8:30—40, vv. 33,37,39.) and when the rich man in hell claimed him for his father, Abraham did not deny the relation, yet showed him no compassion. The rich man despaired of mercy from God, yet cried to Abraham to have mercy on him; as if Abraham had been more merciful than his Maker, and was either able or willing to favour and help the irreconcilable enemies of God!—This is the only scriptural instance of a prayer, offered to a departed saint, and it gives small encouragement to that prevalent species of idolatry.—The wretched supplicant did not expect that Abraham could deliver him out of "that place of torment," or give him any durable relief in it; but he desired that "Lazarus might dip the tip of his finger in water to cool his tongue." A man scorched by intense heat, and parched with exquisite thirst, might crave such a small and momentary alleviation; thus this poor condemned sinner sought a transient abatement of his exquisite misery; being all that he could hope for. His request was the language of despair, and made way for it. His desire that Lazarus might be sent, may either intimate that he retained his haughty spirit in his deepest misery; or else it implied a conviction that Lazarus had been a benevolent man, who wished him well, and was glad to do any one a service when he had it in his power: or, as some think, he considered Lazarus under obligation to him for his charitable donations. (Marg. Ref. p—s.)—Perhaps the particular mention made of the tongue might intimate, that as this member is peculiarly instrumental in promoting wickedness and impiety; so his sufferings were greatly enhanced by the sins which he had committed in his profane and profligate discourse.—Abraham, however, answered him in such a manner, as entirely to extinguish his expiring hopes. He allowed that he was "his son according to the flesh:" but then he should "remember, that he had received his good things." Riches, sensual pleasures, and the pride of life, were the good things which he had chosen, in preference to the favour and image of God and heavenly happiness. In this he had been gratified: he had in his lifetime received and spent his portion, and he must not expect any more good. In like manner Lazarus had received and endured his evil things: he had feared sin and the wrath of God, more than pain, poverty, or contempt: he had chosen sanctified affliction rather than unsanctified prosperity; he had endured his afflictions patiently, and profited by them; and they were now terminated, and he was comforted in heavenly felicity, whilst the rich man was tormented in the flames of hell. This doom was not awarded to the rich man, because he had possessed worldly riches; for Abraham had been rich: but because he idolized and made an ill use of riches; instead of using them as a steward, and seeking God himself for his Portion. (Marg. Ref. u—x.)—To complete the horror of this answer, Abraham assured him, that there was "a great chasm" fixed between the places of happiness and misery: so that if an inhabitant of heaven desired to go to relieve one that was in the place of torment, it would be impracticable; even as it would be for the condemned sinners to leave their prison, and enter the realms of happiness: so that both of them were finally and eternally fixed in their respective states, by the unchangeable decrees of God. (Marg. Ref. y.)—Many in different ages have endeavoured, as it were, to fill up or make a bridge over this "great gulf;" and multitudes have wished them success in the enterprize, as this was their only hope of escaping the rich man's doom; but it has and must be for ever as vain, as his expectation of a drop of water from Lazarus.

V. 27—31. Abraham's answer put a final period to the rich man's forlorn hope: yet he still claimed Abraham as his father; (30) and supposed that, though he could not mitigate his torture, he might prevent the increase of it. He knew there was a passage open between heaven and earth, though none between heaven and hell: he therefore desired that Lazarus might be sent to his father's house; (supposing that he would gladly go on so benevolent an employment;) for he had five brethren, who were living in the same luxury and magnificence as he had done, and were in the way to the same "place of torment." (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—They are represented as thus indulging themselves on earth, while he was in a place of torment. This fully proves the separate state between death and judgment; unless any man can think that our Lord would decorate a parable, in a manner suited to mislead the upright inquirer.—The poor despairing wretch therefore intreated that Lazarus should go, and testify to them concerning the awful realities of the invisible world, and so excite them to repentance, that they might escape the wrath to come. It is intimated in this representation, that the rich man died young: for nothing is said of a family left behind him, and his brethren are supposed to be living together in their father's house, as joint heirs of his estate. We cannot imagine that there is any charity, or even natural affection in hell: we must therefore either consider this as a mere circumstance, intended to introduce the subsequent instruction; or else we must conclude that they whose example, discourse, or seductions have led others into infidelity, impiety, and profligacy, will be rendered more miserable hereafter, by the upbraidings of those whose souls they have murdered: they would therefore most willingly prevent their destruction, for fear of an addition to their own intolerable misery. Many admired writers would now be willing to publish recantations of their skeptical, heretical, or licentious works: many actors would wish to come upon the stage again, to act a different part from those by which they inflamed the passions, and corrupted the principles and morals of mankind; and many false teachers, to inculcate and defend a more orthodox creed than they once propagated. For men will be accountable for all the effects of their conduct, however widely they may spread, or durably they may last; even as he who wickedly sets fire to a house, is answerable for the burning of a city, if the conflagration should extend so far.—In answer to this request Abraham observed, that "they had Moses and the prophets," whom they might "hear" and attend to. In their writings, the future state, the day of judgment, and the way of salvation were declared, and men were warned, exhorted, and invited, as much as it was necessary; so that if they would not hear them, their destruction would be of themselves alone. To this the other replied, that 'surely they would regard one who went to them from among the dead,' and be induced to repentance; as the terror of his appearance, and the awfulness of his warnings, especially coming from a person whom they had known in his life time, would produce a salutary effect upon them. But Abraham closed the conversation, by declaring that if they refused to hear Moses and the prophets, even this would not "persuade them." They might be amazed, affrighted, and restrained by an apparition: but they would not be influenced to renounce sin and the world, to mortify their lusts, to humble themselves before God, to trust his mercy, and devote themselves to his service. Such external demonstrations and alarms would not change their hearts, without which there could be no true repentance; and they had sufficient means of conviction and instruction, if disposed to attend to them. (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, John 5:39—47. 12:42,43.)—It should be recollected that many of those who witnessed the resurrection of Lazarus, did not believe in Christ by means of that stupendous miracle: the Roman soldiers, who saw many circumstances of our Lord's resurrection, immediately after agreed for hire to propagate the most notorious falsehood; and the Jews persisted in their impenitence, amidst the multiplied demonstrations of that same event! And indeed circumstances occur in every age, which sufficiently evince, that no terrors, arguments, or convictions, can effect true repentance, without the special grace of God renewing the sinner's heart. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is indisputable that the wealthiest of men, and indeed all men, are only stewards to the great Lord of all: yet alas! very few duly consider this; and numbers are continually "accused to him of having wasted his goods." The Lord is also frequently calling on them, in his providence and by his word, and inquiring, "How is it that I hear such things of you?" and reminding them that ere long, "they must give account of their stewardship, and be no longer stewards." If no suitable preparation be made for that solemn event, the consequences will be awful beyond conception: we should therefore now seriously inquire, What shall we do, that when "put out of our stewardship," we may be received into a better habitation? The Lord himself has shown us what we should do: and though we need the prudent foresight, yet we have no occasion for the dishonest policy, of the unjust steward; for the way of acceptance and of duty are plainly marked out for us.—Indeed many seem to say, "I cannot dig, and to beg I am ashamed:" they cannot enter hea[ven] by obeying the law, and are too proud to ask and seek salvation, "as the free gift of God through Jesus Christ." Nay, they are equally unwilling to "labour for the meat that endureth unto everlasting life which the Son of Man giveth," or to seek the blessing by fervent prayer. But the believer, though he knows that he can do nothing "himself," will yet "work out his salvation with fear and trembling;" depending on God alone, "for it is he that worketh in us to will and do of his good pleasure." The true believer also shows his faith in Christ by love to his brethren. Instead of "wasting his Lord's goods," he "makes himself friends with the mammon of unrighteousness." Thus he attains "a good hope through grace," that "everlasting mansions" are prepared for him, "when flesh and heart shall fail." But alas! in this respect, as well as in very many other instances, "the children of this world are wiser in their generation, than the children of light:" and though the security and advantage to a man's present comfort, to his family, and in respect of eternity, of communicating gladly and largely to the relief of the necessitous, be demonstrable; yet how scantily do most professed Christians "lend to the LORD," in comparison of the sums wasted in needless embellishments and indulgence, and in feasting the rich! (Note, 14:12—14.) It would be well, if "the children of light" would, on scriptural principles, learn wisdom from the men of the world: and, having chosen their object, would pursue it as singly and constantly, as they do their worthless interests. In this case, what a privilege would wealth be! How much good might be done with it! How much honour would redound to the gospel! How many thanksgivings would be rendered to the Lord! and how many prayers, by those whose souls and bodies were benefited, for the felicity of their benefactors! (Note, 2 Cor. 9:8—15.) And with what satisfaction might "the faithful steward" expect the hour of dissolution, or the coming of his Lord; and anticipate the joy of being then welcomed by such friends to the regions of perfect felicity!

V. 9—18. Those who are in lower circumstances should not forget that they too are the Lord's stewards. Something almost all might spare, that is now wasted, with which to prove their faithfulness "in a little:" and this would ensure a gracious recompense, equally with the larger liberalities of our more wealthy brethren. If men spend even their little upon themselves, they will surely be condemned as unfaithful stewards, when turned out of their stewardship. But there are very many other things besides "the unrighteous mammon," in which they may prove themselves faithful or unfaithful. Some may say, "Silver and gold have I none:" yet, being intrusted with a stewardship of the true riches, they may in deep poverty be more useful than those who are intrusted with great worldly riches; and need not aspire to or desire their advantageous situation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1,2. 2 Cor. 6:3—10.) But surely they are unfit to be intrusted with "the true riches," who are "unfaithful in the unrighteous mammon:" even as they who expect God to give them "the eternal inheritance," though they waste and abuse the talents more or fewer committed to their stewardship, are undeniably indulging a vain and presumptuous confidence. But in vain do men attempt to serve two masters, or to worship God and Mammon: "if the LORD be God" let us decidedly serve him, and devote all we have to his glory. (Notes, Josh. 24:14,15. 1 Kings 18:21.)—When ministers, who have the honour to resemble their Lord in poverty, discourse on such topics, the covetous, whether scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, or Herodians, will be sure to deride them, as visionaries and enthusiasts, if they do not revile them in more opprobrious language. But they little think how entirely the servant of God disregards their contempt and ridicule, and pities their ungodly prosperity. Some indeed of this character are zealous professors of evangelical truth: and if ministers preach against covetousness, or reprove them for it, or exhort them to liberality, they "justify themselves" by a variety of excuses, and call their selfishness by soft names, and so make the matter out "before men" as well as they can: but God knows the wickedness of their hearts; and to him it must be left, when we have reminded them, that "those things which are highly esteemed among men, are abomination in the sight of God," as is every thing exalted, self-sufficient, or haughty. Persons of this description are commonly the bitterest enemies to the power of godliness: and while those who know the worth and the danger of their souls, are pressing through difficulties and temptations into the kingdom of God; they are objecting to the doctrine or exhortations of faithful ministers, and explaining away those scriptures which run counter to their sins; "making void the law" of God by their own notions or traditions, and attempting to prejudice better disposed persons against the truth.

V. 19—26. It is most astonishing, that any man can read this chapter, and profess to believe it to be "the word of God:" and continue to spend his life in those very courses, of which the consequences are so awfully and expressly declared! Yet, what numbers are there, in our prosperous cities, of these "rich men, who are clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day!" and how many more would there be, if men could attain the objects of their wishes! The most of those, who do not resemble the rich sinner here described, are either restrained by penurious avarice, or by murmuring, envying, and grudging poverty. Multitudes go to the utmost limits of their ability, nay, beyond what they can afford; and then fret continually to see themselves outdone by their more prosperous neighbours! —What person of common sense would deliberately prefer the rich man's lot, in life, death, and eternity, to that of Lazarus? yet how few prefer "suffering affliction with the people of God, to the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season!" (Note, Heb. 11:24—26.) Alas! most men endeavour to disbelieve or forget such declarations, that they may not be disturbed by painful reflections, in their pursuit of worldly gratifications: so that they refuse to "lift up their eyes," till they drop into hell; and then they curse and bewail their own madness and folly, and envy the condition of the meanest beggar, whom here they scorned, loathed, and neglected. But it is vain for him who has no mercy on the poor, to expect mercy from God: and even if his luxury and splendour be not supported by rapine, oppression, and murder; yet, "if any man have this world's good, and see his brother

CHAPTER XVII.

Jesus teaches his disciples carefully to avoid giving offences, 1, 2; and to forgive one another, 3, 4. Being asked by the apostles to increase their faith, he shows the power of faith, 5, 6; and that man's best obedience has no merit with God, 7—10. He cleanses ten lepers; of whom one only, and he a Samaritan, returns to give thanks to God, 11—19. The spiritual nature of the kingdom of God, 20—22. The manner in which it was about to be established, with the ruin of all who neglected it, 23—37.

THEN said he unto the disciples, [a]It is impossible but that offences will come; but wo unto him through whom they come!

2 It were [b]better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend [c]one of these little ones.

3 Take [d]heed to yourselves: [e]if thy brother trespass against thee, [f]rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.

4 And [g]if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, [h]I repent; thou shalt forgive him.

5 And the apostles said unto the Lord, [i]Increase our faith.

6 And the Lord said, [k]If ye had faith [l]as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamine-tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea, and it should obey you.

7 But [m]which of you, having a servant ploughing, or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat.

8 And will not rather say unto him, [n]Make ready wherewith I may sup, [o]and gird thyself, and serve me till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink?

have need, and shut up his bowels of compassion from him;" he has no right to call himself the disciple of the blessed Jesus. "Let no man therefore deceive himself by vain words."—He who said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away," has here stated to us, that when any one dies, his soul immediately is received into heavenly felicity, or cast into the fire of hell; that whilst the bodies of rich sinners are entombed, often with the vain ostentation of the survivors, "they lift up their eyes in hell, being in torment;" that neither God, nor saints, nor angels, will show them any more mercy; that even pious parents, who here prayed for and wept over their children, will hereafter approve of their final condemnation; that not the least mitigation of their misery can be obtained, not "a drop of water to cool the" burning "tongue of those tormented in that flame" can be procured, by all their cries and entreaties; that with the dying sinner's breath all his hopes expire, and an end is put to all "his good things;" and that "a great gulf is fixed," and all escape is rendered for ever impossible. —Plausible objections to these truths, or direct contradictions of them, may be advanced; and those "who speak according to the oracles of God," will be ridiculed and reviled, as melancholy or malevolent men: for numbers feel it their interest, (according to the tenor of their present conduct,) that any view of this subject should be true, rather than that of revelation: but when one after another dies, and "lifts up his eyes in hell," he awfully finds whose words have been accomplished, the Lord's, or those of such as dared to contradict him. Instead therefore of presumptuously speculating on the brink of this tremendous precipice; (like him who lost his life by attempting to discover the source of the flames of mount Ætna;) let us copy the example of those, who fled from the gaping earth, "lest it should swallow them up also." (Num. 16:34.) If there were only a peradventure of sinking from ungodly self-indulgence into everlasting misery, or of obtaining eternal life by any possible self-denial; a wise man would surely relinquish (if needful) the greatest affluence, submit to abject penury, embrace a dunghill, and endure far severer miseries than those of Lazarus, without a murmur or hesitation. But the matter is as certain as the word of "God who cannot lie." The rich are not, in common cases, required to leave their estates, or to forego any real comfort of them: nay, the temperance and moderation commanded them, tend to increase the measure of their actual enjoyment; while the liberal distribution, to which they are exhorted and encouraged, leads to additional pleasures, almost as much superior to the epicure's gratifications, as the felicity of an angel exceeds that of the lowest animal. But should the Lord call us to endure poverty, pain, and sickness, he will not leave us comfortless. It is possible that a believer "may be laid at a rich man's gate full of sores, and desire" in vain "to be fed with the crumbs from his table;" but it is not possible, that he should be deprived of the mercy of his heavenly Father. He may be unattended, in pain and sickness, by physicians, friends, or servants: but angels will minister to him, and watch around his dying bed: and the Spirit of God will communicate effectual consolations. And should want or neglect (which rarely happens) shorten his life; he will only be the sooner removed from "his evil things," and introduced to the enjoyment of complete felicity: so that in every possible case, they, and they only, "are blessed, who have the LORD for their God." (Note, Ps. 84:11,12. P. O.)

V. 27—31. It is vain to imagine that other evidence, or means of instruction, would induce men to repentance, while they neglect "the word of God." Those who have perished in sin could indeed come, and tell such a tale of wo, as would harrow up the soul with horror, or drive men to distraction; and probably some of them would, if at liberty, try in this way to prevent their own increasing misery. The souls also of departed saints could relate astonishing things of their own blessedness, and of the misery of the damned: and sinners on earth or in hell may fancy that this would bring men to repentance. But "the testimony of the LORD is sure, and giveth wisdom to the simple," and is the best and the only means of converting souls which God has promised to bless and prosper. Though the witness of saints or angels is great, "the witness of God is greater:" the same things are testified to in the sacred Scriptures, which would be told us by "one that should come from the dead." He that rejects this testimony, "makes God a liar," and further proof would be improper: an apparition might produce a greater temporary alarm, but it would not afford so solid and permanent a ground of conviction; and therefore if men "believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." Instead then of indulging unwarranted speculations, let every one take heed to the sure word of truth, and pray to God for that new heart and humble spirit, without which all means must prove ineffectual: and let us conclude by seriously inquiring, "What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (P. O. Matt. 16:21—28.)

V. 3, 4. 'This contains a strong and important intimation, how much sin and scandal is occasioned by a severe quarrelsome temper in the disciples of Christ: as it not only stirs up the corruptions of those with whom they contend; but leads others to think meanly of a profession which has so little efficacy to soften and sweeten the temper of those who maintain it.' Doddridge.—Forgive, &c. (3) Notes, Matt. 6:12,14,15. 18:15—35.—We are required to forgive those who do not repent, so as to pray for them, and to wait for an opportunity of doing them good: but our friendly intercourse with such as have been evidently injurious, and obstinately persist in evil, and our confidence in them, or esteem of their character, must necessarily be in some measure interrupted. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6:27—38. 1 Sam. 30:26,31. Matt. 5:43—48. Rom. 12:14—21.)

V. 5, 6. The apostles perceived the excellency, and the difficulty, of the conduct prescribed to them; and that faith in the divine mercy, grace, and truth was the principle from which it must proceed: they therefore besought Jesus to "increase their faith." This implied a full persuasion, that he was able to remove those impediments to the vigorous exercise of faith, which they could not. (Note, Mark 9:16—24, v. 24.) True faith is "the gift of God," and the work of his power: nor can it be conceived possible for one mere man, or creature, so to influence the mind of another, by any direct act of power, as to produce faith, where it did not before exist, or to increase it when weak and wavering. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, 1 Cor. 2:3—5. Eph. 2:4—10, v. 8. Heb. 12:2,3.) According therefore to the system of Arians and Socinians, our Lord would have reproved the disciples for attributing too much to him: but, on the contrary, his answer evidently implied an approbation of their petition; and was a further recommendation to them of that powerful principle, to which "all things are possible."—The idea of a tree being planted, taking root, and growing, in the unstable ocean, is a most emphatical figure to represent to us that by faith "we may do all things, through Christ who strengtheneth us." (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Matt. 17:19—21. 21:21,22 Mark 11:22—26. 2 Cor. 12:7—10.)

12 And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, [r]which stood afar off:

13 And they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, [s]have mercy on us.

14 And when he saw them, he said unto them, [t]Go show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that [u]as they went, they were cleansed.

out. A man who possessed and maintained a servant would think himself entitled to his services, one after another, through the day; and yet would not thank him for them at night, or think himself under obligation to him, as for a favour conferred; even though he had been faithful and obedient. Now the Lord has such a property in every creature, as no man can have in another; and he can never be indebted to us for our most constant and unremitted services. The obedience of angels, who "do all that is commanded them," and that perfectly, leaves them "unprofitable servants," who have only done their duty, without having at all benefited the Lord, or conferred any favour on him. (Note, Rom. 11:33—36.) The services of redeemed sinners therefore, who are under peculiar obligations to obedience, who do no good thing except by his grace, and who "in many things offend all," can never deserve recompense, or give any ground for boasting, or in any way be profitable to God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Job 22:1—4. 35:4—8. Ps. 16:2, 3. Matt. 25:24—30.) A constant succession of services, and an unreserved obedience, with the deepest sense of dependence, unworthiness, and obligation to the Lord, are therefore here most powerfully inculcated. 'It is the duty of servants, after they have done their work in the field, to minister to their lord as he shall require; and when they have done what he requires, they for that service merit not so much as thanks, because they only do their duty. If then I treat you more liberally, rather as friends than as servants; if I condescend to "minister unto you," and "place you over all that I have;" (12:37, 44.) you are not to imagine that I am indebted to you, or owe you such favours, but rather are to acknowledge, when you have done all, that you are still unprofitable servants, and only have performed your duty.... Here Christ destroys two doctrines of the schools; the merit of good works, and works of supererogation.' Whitby.

V. 11—19. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Matt. 8:1—4. Mark 1:40—44.) At some place on the confines of Galilee and Samaria, these lepers met Christ in his last circuit. They were companions in distress, and therefore they associated together; though one at least of them was a Samaritan. Having heard of our Lord's miracles, they standing at a distance, with loud cries, earnestly begged of him to compassionate their case, and cleanse their leprosy; having a general belief of his power to perform the miracle. Jesus therefore sent them to the priests, some of whom probably lived in that neighbourhood: and having been cleansed by the mighty power of Christ when at a distance from him, nine of them attested their cleansing before the priests, and then returned home. But one of them, even a Samaritan, being more deeply affected with the mercy vouchsafed him, came back to Jesus, glorifying the God of Israel; and returning thanks to his gracious Benefactor, he cast himself prostrate at his feet. The priests would not have attended to the case of a Samaritan, and he could not be admitted to offer the appointed sacrifices at the temple: but he took the proper method of showing his gratitude. This gave our Lord occasion to remark, as with surprise, that "this stranger" alone had "returned to give glory to God;" whilst the nine others who had been cleansed, though most, if not all of them were Jews, had failed of rendering him their thankful acknowledgments. Probably, the Samaritan alone believed in Jesus, as the Messiah, the Saviour of sinners: and this faith, united with a consciousness of his own unworthiness, produced the difference in his conduct. He was therefore dismissed, with the assurance that his "faith had saved him:" the others obtained the outward cure, he alone got the spiritual blessing. (Marg. Ref. s—d. Notes, 7:44—50. Acts 4:5—12.)—The connexion between "returning" to give thanks to Jesus, and "giving glory to God," is peculiarly to be observed. It is probable that the others, at the temple, gave thanks to God for their recovery; but they disregarded Jesus, their immediate Benefactor. (Note, John 5:20—23.)

V. 20—23. The Pharisees understood that the doctrine, miracles, and ministry of our Lord, implied a claim to the character of the promised Messiah; and, according to their notions of temporal victory and dominion, they desired to know from him, "when the kingdom of God should come." To this he replied, that it would "not come with observation," and be conspicuous by outward splendour and magnificent displays, like the triumphs of conquerors, or the coronation of kings and emperors; "for behold, the kingdom of God is within you." The Jews expected a kingdom like the kingdoms of this world; and overlooked such things as, according to the prophets, marked out the promised kingdom of the Messiah, which was to be of a spiritual nature, set up in the hearts of men by the power of divine grace. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e. Note, Rom. 14:13—18, v. 17.) It could not indeed be said to be thus "within" the Pharisees; but it was so, as to many of those whom they despised: and it must be in them also thus set up, or they would derive no advantage from it. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f, g.)—The establishment of the kingdom of God involved the ruin of its opposers, and the subversion of the Jewish polity: and some think that these events are intended. (Notes, Matt. 3:2. Mark 9:1.)—To this our Lord added, that his disciples would soon be deprived of his personal presence: and while they longed in vain for one of the days which they now enjoyed, or of those which they waited for of the Son of man when he should come to set up his kingdom; they would be tempted to follow those seducers, who would then pretend to be the Messiah: but they must carefully reject their solicitations. Lot's wife left Sodom; yet lost her life by looking back to those possessions and connexions which she was called to forsake: and thus she was made a perpetual warning to men in every age, not to allow even a wish for, or hankering desire after, those sinful interests or indulgences which religion requires them to renounce, lest they should be drawn aside to destruction. (Note, Gen. 19:26.)—The manner in which our Lord introduces this short but emphatical warning, is suited to excite our deepest attention. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 33—37. Our Lord further reminded the disciples, that in the day, when he should be revealed to execute vengeance on the Jews, those professed disciples who had sought to preserve their lives by forsaking their religion, would perish miserably; while those, who were willing to lose their lives for his sake, should be marvellously protected. (Notes, Matt. 16:24—28. John 12:23—26.) Providence would indeed singularly interpose, "in that night," in the depth of the distresses which were coming on the Jews, to preserve the remnant of believers who were living among them: insomuch that when two persons were sleeping or working together in the same place, the Romans would seize or kill the one; and the other would escape in some unexpected manner. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. While we adore the awful depths of the divine judgments, in permitting such scandals in the church, as harden multitudes in unbelief; and while we allow, that "it is impossible," without constant miracles, "but that offences must come;" let us recollect that these considerations do not in the least exculpate those "by whom they come." We should therefore fear, more than even a violent and ignominious death, every action which may prejudice men against the gospel, or stumble so much as one weak believer: and we ought to "abstain from all appearance of evil," in every case when we can do it without committing real evil. We should endeavour to be harmless in all things, and to do good to all men, as we are able; and also "take heed to ourselves" not to yield to resentment against such as injure us. If then our brother has trespassed against us, we should privately and meekly expostulate with him; and if he repent, we should cordially forgive him, and be reconciled to him, without insisting rigorously on satisfaction: nay, if this should be repeated many times in a day, we must not allow our amity to be interrupted by it, provided the private wrong do not involve in it a public scandal; for thus the peace of the church, the good of souls, and the honour of God and his gospel, may best be promoted, to which all other considerations should be subordinated.—But this strict precept is replete with encouragement to the humble believer. He is often betrayed, more than "seven times a day," into those things which need repentance and forgiveness; and this consciousness, which covers him with shame, would also sink him into dejection, did he not recollect that his gracious Lord would not require him so constantly to forgive his offending brother, were he not ready also in like manner to forgive his offending children. This will by no means encourage him to sin, but rather "lead him to repentance;" (Note, Rom. 2:4—6.) yet it will support him, in his painful conflict, while he grieves that "he cannot do the things that he would." (P. O. Matt. 18:)—When we would imitate the example of our forgiving Lord, or perform any duty which runs counter to corrupt nature; we shall perceive our need of faith, both to realize our motives to obedience, and to lay hold on an almighty Arm for assistance. Then we shall also feel the weakness of our faith, and our inability to strengthen it; and be led to look unto Jesus, both as the Author and the Object of faith; beseeching him to increase that precious grace, on which the exercise of all others depends: nor will the Lord refuse to answer this request.—All men are bound to be the servants of the great Creator, and to devote all their time and powers to him; and are justly condemned for not doing "all those things which are commanded." But as Christians, we are servants to our redeeming God, and bound to obedience by immensely superior obligations. We should therefore serve him in our several places, without intermission: one duty should succeed another, through each of our days; and every personal interest or indulgence should be postponed, and give place to his glory and his command; yet at last we merit no reward, and have nothing to boast of; but must still say, "We are unprofitable servants, we have done that which was our duty to do;" and at the same time we must humbly confess our guilt in every instance in which we have come short of this perfect obedience. But were it possible for a man to serve God, as Paul did, or even as Gabriel does, and then to become exalted in an opinion of his own worthiness; this would tarnish all, and he would "fall into the condemnation of the devil." How horribly impious then, how sacrilegious must it be, for sinners to boast of their poor polluted services, as if they could atone for their sins, make God their Debtor, purchase heavenly felicity, or even merit for others also!

V. 11—19. Through pride, ingratitude towards God came into the world. Of the numberless multitudes, who have been created, and are upheld by his power, and who feast upon his bounty; how few are thankful for his goodness! When vice and folly bring sickness on men, and the Lord in mercy again restores their health; most of them immediately use their returning vigour, in adding to their former provocations. (Note, Ps. 107:17—22. P. O. 1—22.) Of the numbers discharged cured from our various hospitals, how few "return to give glory to God," "not only with their lips, but in their lives!" Even of those who cry unto him in distress, and entreat him mercifully to spare them," how few afterwards "praise him for his goodness," and live to his glory! Of those whom ministers visit in sickness, and who give some indications of repentance, how large a proportion, when they recover in answer to their prayers, live only to disappoint their expectations! In this case it may generally be said, "Were there not ten healed? But where are the nine?" And of those who enjoy the best means of grace, and make some general profession of seeking mercy from Jesus; how few are there who glorify God by living according to that profession! All this springs from the want of a broken heart; a deep sense of their need of free salvation, and a real reliance on Christ, and earnest, frequent, persevering application to him to cleanse them from the leprosy of sin. For when a man is convinced of his guilt and pollution, and that he must for ever be excluded from the company of God and his saints, unless he be cleansed by the divine Saviour; he will heartily seek mercy, by using the means of grace, and observe the Lord's directions in humble expectation: and when he experiences the comfort of his forgiveness, and the power of his new-creating Spirit, he will glorify God, and most thankfully adore the gracious Saviour. This is the source of gratitude in our sinful hearts; it springs from deep humility and lively faith, and it produces fervent praises and cheerful obedience. Thus strangers are brought nigh to the Lord; poor Samaritans put to shame and condemn proud Israelites; those who have greatly sinned, "love much, because much hath been forgiven them;" and whilst they give the whole praise to the Lord, he delights in communicating

CHAPTER XVIII.

The parable of the unjust judge and the importunate widow, showing that men should pray without fainting, 1—8. That of the Pharisee and the publican, 9—14. Jesus receives and blesses little children, showing that his disciples should be like them, 15—17. He detects the covetousness of a young ruler; shows the danger of riches; and promises great rewards to those who forsake things present for his sake, 18—30. He foretells his own sufferings, death, and resurrection, 31—34. He opens the eyes of a blind man, 35—43.

AND he spake a parable unto them to this end, [a]that men ought always to pray, [b]and not to faint;

2 Saying, There was in a [c]city a judge, [c]which feared not God, neither [d]regarded man:

3 And there was [e]a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, [f]Avenge me of mine adversary.

4 And he would not for a while: but afterward [g]he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man;

5 Yet [h]because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she [i]weary me.

6 And the LORD said, Hear what the unjust judge saith.

7 And [k]shall not God [l]avenge his own elect, [m]which cry day and night unto him, [n]though he bear long with them?

8 I tell you, that [o]he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, [p]when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?

comfort to them. (P. O. 7:39—50.)—And let us not forget that we cannot "honour the Father," except we honour his beloved Son; and that when we bow to Jesus in adoring gratitude, we most acceptably give glory unto God.

V. 20—37. It is not uncommon for men to profess that they are inquiring after truth, and "waiting for the kingdom of God;" while they oppose the progress which it makes among them, and despise those who have it set up within them. They are looking for outward splendour, human wisdom, or the success of their own party: but the kingdom of God consists not in meats and drinks, in vestments and temples, in names and forms; but "in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost:" and it commonly has the greatest success, when least attended with ostentation; when unassuming modesty and gentleness characterize the instruments employed; and when "the word of truth and the power of God" silently operate, and nothing noisy or showy attracts notice, or needlessly excites opposition.—Many, who now despise "the days of the Son of man," and refuse to hearken to his gospel, will at length dolefully wish that they might see one more such day; but this will for ever be in vain: and, even in this world, those who despise the truth commonly become the dupes of destructive lies, and are given up to strong delusions.—Our blessed Redeemer has finished his sufferings, and ascended into his glory. The generation to whom he preached, and among whom he wrought his miracles, reviled and crucified him: but his day of vengeance soon arrived; his powerful indignation, like lightning, suddenly pervaded the whole land, and the Jews were destroyed amidst their carnal security and sensual indulgence, by as tremendous judgments as the deluge, or as the fire and brimstone which consumed Sodom and Gomorrah. Yea, divine vengeance followed even the scattered remnant of them, as eagles resort where the carcasses are laid; and indeed they are in a measure pursued by it to this day. Yet the remnant, who obeyed the word and relied on the promise of Christ, were as remarkably preserved.—But has not the Saviour been rejected by other generations also? and is there not a still more awful day coming, when he shall appear to judge the world? In this we are all interested. Yet alas! most men live now, as they did in the days of Noah and of Lot; notwithstanding the warnings given in the word of God, to prepare to meet him in judgment! They are generally given up to worldly interests or pleasures, as if life had no period, or there were no future judgment. In this course they proceed, till death, like the deluge, or the fire from heaven, sweeps them into destruction: and thus will it also be "in the day, when the Son of man shall be revealed." But let those who profess to be Christ's disciples, make haste to escape for their lives; to get into the ark; to flee from Sodom; to renounce all for Christ; to prepare to meet their God. Let us all "remember Lot's wife;" that we may no longer hanker after those things which we have left behind, or be tempted to "draw back unto perdition:" let us venture our lives and souls in the Lord's hands; and fear nothing so much as being deluded into sinful methods of seeking present security: and then we shall certainly be "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation."—The time is speedily coming, when they who have lived together in families, unite in the most endeared relations, partners in the same employments, or even partakers of the same religious ordinances, will in numberless instances be finally and eternally separated; while one shall be taken to heaven, and another left to perish for ever in hell. For as the messengers of the Lord's mercy will "gather together his elect from the four winds of heaven," into his kingdom of complete felicity; so the executioners of his vengeance will pursue the wicked to every place, whither they may flee to hide themselves, that they may cast them into the furnace of his fiery indignation. "Remember us, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit us with thy salvation." (Note, Ps. 106:4,5.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—8. This parable is prefaced by a brief statement of the instruction intended by it. It was spoken, "that men should pray always and not faint." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 21:34—36.) Men ought to pray constantly at stated times; to be habitually in that spirit of humble dependence, desire, and expectation, which give life to prayer; to be frequently offering ejaculatory petitions; and to be always ready for prayer, secret, social or public, when opportunity is afforded: and they ought not "to faint," or grow slack, through delays, disappointments, difficulties, temptations, persecutions, and conflicts with in-dwelling sin; or even if foiled repeatedly in those conflicts.—Our Lord, in giving this general rule, seems to have had a particular reference to the state of his disciples, under the persecutions which awaited them from the unbelieving Jews, before his coming with power to set up his kingdom, and execute vengeance on their enemies. For this they were exhorted "to pray without fainting." And to encourage them in so doing, he stated the case of a judge, who neither regarded the favour of God, nor feared his wrath; and who cared not for the welfare or the opinion of men, but determined causes, merely as best suited his interest, conveniency, or caprice. (Note, 2 Sam. 23:3,4.) To this man a widow made application for protection against her oppressor; and as often as he appeared in public, she renewed her suit: but as he did not regard the wrong done to her, or hope for any profit, or fear any danger from her; he for a time refused to do her justice. At length however he revolved the matter in his mind: and though he seems to have gloried in disregarding both God and man; yet he determined to defend her, and punish her adversary, lest she should weary, or stun him, with her continual applications. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—i.) Now if an unjust judge might be induced to an action, contrary to his habitual character and inclination, for a person whom he neither loved nor feared, merely by an importunity which he hated; how much more would God, who is perfect in justice, truth, and goodness, answer the persevering prayers of his people whom he loves, (even those prayers in which he delights,) by fulfilling those promises which he has given for the glory of his name, and by such interpositions as accord to his own holy excellency! (Note, 11:7—13, v. 8.) He might indeed bear with them, and leave them to pray, for a long time, under troubles and discouragements, to prove their sincerity, and to increase their humility, simplicity, and fervency: but he would doubtless answer them in due time, deliver them from their afflictions, and "speedily" avenge them on their enemies. This will be speedily; as it will come soon enough for every good purpose, and in a sudden and unexpected manner. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) The word elect or chosen, must, in this connexion, especially mean those who have already been called by divine grace to join the number of fervent supplicants: and the answer to their prayers for deliverance, necessarily implies the infliction of vengeance on their impenitent persecutors. The concluding clause may be differently interpreted: probably our Lord meant, that when he came to deliver the church, and to avenge his people on their Jewish persecutors; he should find but little faith in the land. The Jews would be hardened in unbelief; and the Christians, having been harassed by long persecutions, would be ready to doubt of the performance of his word; while many would draw back to perdition. It may also refer to the general weakness of the faith of his tempted and afflicted people, while they are waiting for him to come to their relief. (Notes, Matt. 24:9—14, vv. 10—12. Heb. 10:28—25,35—39.)—Some think that a great prevalence of infidelity will take place, just before Christ shall come to judge the world; (Note, Rev. 20:7—9.) as it is probable there will be immediately before the introduction of the millennium.

9 ¶ And he spake this parable unto certain [n]which trusted in themselves, [o]that they were righteous, [p]and despised others:

10 Two men went up [q]into the temple to pray; the one [r]a Pharisee, and the other a publican.

11 The Pharisee [s]stood, and prayed thus with himself, [t]God, I thank thee, that I am not [u]as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

12 I [v]fast twice in the week, [w]I give tithes of all that I possess.

13 And the publican, [x]standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, [y]but smote upon his breast, saying, [z]God be merciful to me [a]a sinner.

14 I tell you, This man [b]went down to his house [c]justified rather than the other: for [d]every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

15 ¶ And [e]they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them: but when his disciples saw it, [f]they rebuked them.

16 But Jesus called them unto him, and said, [g]Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; [h]for of such is the kingdom of God.

17 Verily I say unto you, [i]Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein. [Practical Observations.]

18 ¶ And [j]a certain ruler asked him, saying, [k]Good Master, [l]what shall I do to inherit eternal life?

19 And Jesus said unto him, [m]Why callest thou me good? none is good, save one, that is, God.

20 Thou [n]knowest the commandments, [o]Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother.

21 And he said, [p]All these have I kept from my youth up.

V. 9—14. The persons to whom our Lord spake this parable, were confident that they were righteous, accepted of God, and his peculiar favourites; and they "despised others," "the rest," all others, who did not comply with their rules, as vile and unholy. The Pharisees were especially intended, who relied on exemption from gross immoralities, attendance on the externals of religion, and exact observance of the traditions of the elders.—To these persons our Lord stated, that two men went up to the temple to perform their devotions: the one a Pharisee, one of that sect who were looked upon as examples of piety; the other a publican, one of those who were regarded as the most atrocious of sinners. The Pharisee, full of self-confidence, "stood and prayed thus with himself." Probably he stood apart from the other worshippers, either that he might be noticed, or lest he should be polluted. In this situation he addressed God, thanking him that he was not as other men, or as "the rest of men," were; enumerating some gross vices, from which he was free, and some supposed duties in which he was exact; and viewing the publican at a distance with contempt and abhorrence. (Marg. Ref. q—z. Notes, 7:44—50. Is. 65:3—7, v. 5.)—A humble believer indeed will say, "God, I thank thee, that I am not like other men;" (Note, 1 Cor. 4:6,7. 15:3—11, v. 10. Eph. 3:8.) meaning that the whole difference between him and the worst of those who disgrace civil society, or are cut off from it by the hand of the executioner, is owing wholly to providential restraints, or to the sanctifying grace of God: but at the same time he has very many sins to confess with deep humiliation; he feels himself a guilty, polluted, weak, foolish, indigent creature; he does not generally conclude any one to be viler than he is, all circumstances considered; he pities and prays for the most abandoned, and hopes that they are penitent whenever there are favourable appearances; and he knows, that he is still liable to be tempted to the most atrocious crimes, yea, and overcome by temptation, unless the Lord uphold him. But, "God, I thank thee" was merely a word of course in the Pharisee's mouth. He spake as if he had not been a sinner, in any respect; and as if he were in no danger at all of falling into temptation and sin. He disdainfully mentioned the publican in particular; as if he were one for whom there was no pardon, or as if it had been impossible that he should repent: and he could not expatiate on his own goodness, without contrasting it with the publican's supposed extortion and injustice. In fact there was neither confession of sin nor petition in his prayer; but he was in his own opinion "rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing." (Note, Rev. 3:17.) But truly a man may be exempt from the gross crimes of robbery, extortion, and adultery; and yet be covetous, unmerciful, contentious, revengeful, proud, envious, deceitful; in short, like Satan in all the leading features of his character. He may use uncommanded austerities, "fast twice a week," or more frequently; be scrupulously honest in some particulars, even to minuteness; and yet be destitute of "judgment, mercy, and the love of God:" nay, he may be a hypocrite, a perjurer, and even a sensualist: he may not be "like the publican;" and yet far worse than he.—But the publican "stood afar off," in some remote corner of the court, as unworthy to come near the other worshippers, and especially to approach that holy man, the Pharisee: and though his burdened conscience and inward distress constrained him to pray, yet he did not presume to "lift up his eyes unto heaven;" but with downcast looks, as one overwhelmed with shame, and "smiting upon his breast," as full of self-abhorrence at the recollection of his crimes, only said, "God be merciful to me a sinner." These emphatical words, (which in the original imply the idea of atonement as the ground of forgiveness,) when really the language of the heart express humiliation for sin, repentance, submission to God's righteousness, faith, and hope of pardon and acceptance. Thus the publican left his cause with God, and "returned home to his house." But our Lord assured those "who trusted in themselves," that he was justified, or counted a righteous person before God, "rather than the other," or in preference to him.—(Marg. Ref. b—g. Notes, Ps. 32:3—5. 51:1,2,17. Prov. 28:13. Is. 57:15,16. 61:1—3. Matt. 3:3.) The Pharisee, relying on the merit of his own goodness, and puffed up with an opinion of his singular holiness, remained under the condemnation of the law, and a stranger to the grace of the gospel: but the publican, by confessing his guilt, and crying for mercy as a sinner, became partaker of the blessings of the new covenant of mercy and grace, according to that rule which has before been considered. (Notes, 14:7—11.)—Tithes. (12) 11:42. Notes, Lev. 27:30—34. Matt. 23:23,24. Heb. 7:4—10.—It does not appear that the Pharisee meant any thing more than the legal tithes; though some think that he devoted a tenth of his gains to pious and charitable uses: but had our Lord intended, by the words put into the Pharisee's mouth, to convey that idea; he would no doubt have made this point more prominent.

28 ¶ Then Peter said, [g]Lo, we have left all, and followed thee.

29 And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, [h]There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, 30 Who shall not receive [i]manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.

31 ¶ Then he took unto him the twelve, and said unto them, [k]Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, [l]and all things, that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man, shall be accomplished.

32 For he shall be [m]delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be [n]mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on:

33 And they shall scourge him, and put him to death; [o]and the third day he shall rise again.

34 And [p]they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken.

35 ¶ And it came to pass, that [q]as he was come nigh unto Jericho, a certain blind man sat by the way-side [r]begging:

36 And hearing the multitude pass by, [s]he asked what it meant.

37 And [t]they told him, that [u]Jesus of Nazareth passed by.

38 And he cried, saying, [x]Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me.

39 And they which went before, [y]rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: [z]but he cried so much the more, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

40 And Jesus [a]stood, and commanded him to be brought unto him; and when he was come near, he asked him, 41 Saying, [b]What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee? And he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight.

42 And Jesus said unto him, [c]Receive thy sight: [d]thy faith have saved thee.

43 And immediately [e]he received his sight, [f]and followed him, glorifying God: and all the people, when they saw it, gave praise unto God.

V. 35—43. (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 10:46—52.) The beggars, of whom we read in Scripture, lived in the place or neighbourhood where they asked alms, and so were known to be real objects of charity: they also gave a kind of pledge for their good behaviour. This widely differs from the modern case of strolling beggars, who are frequently impostors, and still more generally profligate characters. Except in extraordinary cases, it is in all respects most advisable to relieve those who are known by us both as to their wants and conduct: and, provided less be not given in charity, and no extreme case neglected, the refusal of relief to vagrant beggars, is rather a proof of discretion, than an indication of defect in beneficence. If this conduct were generally adopted, the indigent would, in ordinary cases, be compelled to abide where they are known; the sums expended in charity would be far more profitably applied; the interests of morality and religion would be better secured; and the poor themselves would be far more adequately relieved.—Receive thy sight. (42) It is worthy of observation, that giving sight to the blind was peculiar to our Saviour. No instance is recorded in Scripture of this miracle having been wrought, either by prophets before his coming, or by his apostles afterwards; nor is it mentioned among the miraculous powers which he conferred on them. In answer to Elisha's prayer, indeed, the Lord smote with a temporary and partial blindness, the men who came to take the prophet; and afterwards, at his request, their eyes were again opened: but this was very different from giving sight to those who were born blind, or who had become blind by disease. Our Lord was "the Light of the world." "The eyes of the blind being opened" is frequently mentioned by the prophets, as accompanying the advent of the Messiah; and the literal fulfilment of these predictions was a striking emblem of the effects of his gospel and grace, in enlightening the minds of men. (Notes, Ps. 146:8. Is. 29:17—19. 35:5—7. John 9:4—7. Acts 26:18—20.) Glorifying God, &c. (43) These circumstances are added to that which was recorded by Mark.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The very great importance of earnest, persevering prayer, and the hinderances with which we must expect to meet in attending to it, are brought to our minds with peculiar energy, by these repeated exhortations, "to pray always, and not to faint:" (Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4. 1 Thes. 5:16—22, vv. 17,18.) and we may learn how to draw instruction from every object, and every incident, by the animating conclusions deduced from the conduct of "the unjust judge."—Alas! that there should be so many, even in authority, among professed Christians, who "neither fear God, nor regard man," and who glory in impiety and iniquity! No wonder, when this is the case, that cruel oppressions and unrighteous decrees abound in cities and provinces: but what will such men do, when God shall cite them to his tribunal, to avenge on them the cause of those whom they have injured, "because it was in the power of their hand to do it?"—Whether importunity, or any other address to their self-love, will induce them to do justice, or not; yet God will surely plead the cause of "his own elect, who cry night and day unto him, and avenge them" on all their adversaries. We must not indeed seek vengeance on our enemies, but should pray for their conversion: yet we may, and ought, to desire the deliverance of the church from those who oppress or corrupt her; even though accompanied with their destruction. Whether we seek to be delivered from temptation, to have our iniquities subdued, and our souls comforted; or whether we pray for the peace of the church; we shall at length be answered, if we be earnest, importunate, and persevering in prayer: and, however long the Lord "bear with us," our requests will be granted in the best time, and perhaps when we least expect it. However infidels may deride and defy the threatened judgments of God; or however Christians may be tempted to despond concerning his promises; yet they will be accomplished in the appointed season: and the surprise of terror on the one hand, and that of joy on the other, will then be nearly equal.

V. 9—17. We ought especially to beware of presenting proud and self-preferring devotions to the Lord. Too many of different descriptions "trust in themselves that they are righteous," and take it for granted that they are the peculiar, and almost exclusive, favourites of heaven; whilst their contempt of others proves the haughtiness and uncharitableness

CHAPTER XIX.

The conversion of Zacheus the publican, 1—10. The parable of a nobleman going to receive a kingdom, and intrusting money to his servants; with the account required of them, and the punishment of his enemies, 11—27. Jesus enters Jerusalem riding on an ass, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, 28—38. He answers the objection of the Pharisees, 39, 40; weeps over the city, and predicts its destruction, 41—44; drives the traders from the temple, 45, 46; and teaches daily there, while the rulers seek to kill him, 47, 48.

AND Jesus entered and passed through [a]Jericho.

2 And, behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans; [b]and he was rich.

3 And [c]he sought to see Jesus, who he was; and could not for the press, [d]because he was little of stature.

4 And he ran before, [e]and climbed up into [f]a sycamore tree to see him: for he was to pass that way.

5 And when Jesus came to the place, [g]he looked up, and saw him, and said unto him, [h]Zaccheus, make haste, and come down; [i]for to-day I must abide at thy house.

6 And [k]he made haste, and came down, and received him [l]joyfully.

7 And when they saw it, [m]they all murmured, saying, That he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner.

8 And Zaccheus stood, and said unto the Lord, [n]Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man [o]by false accusation, [p]I restore him fourfold.

9 And Jesus said unto him, [q]This day is salvation come to this house, [r]forsomuch as he also is a son of Abraham.

10 For [s]the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost. [Practical Observations.]

of their hearts. Such men may address the Lord in a high tone of confidence and familiarity: they may profess to give him the glory; they may boast, that they are not like the rest of men, not extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or like the poor publicans around them; and glory in their gifts, forms, notions, or austerities: yet it will be proved that "they have exalted themselves," and therefore God will certainly "abase them:" and all their revilings, calumnies, and rash judgments, will fall on their own heads, and increase their shame and everlasting contempt; except they be previously humbled in deep repentance, and come with "the publicans and sinners" whom they disdained, for unmerited mercy through the great atonement.—But "blessed are the poor in spirit, for their's is the kingdom of heaven." (Note, Matt. 5:3.) The man who abhors and condemns himself; who approaches God with deep self-abasement, and reverence of his holy majesty; who looks into his past life, his present conduct, his heart, his duties, with humiliation of soul; who is ready to think every one better than himself, and must despair were it not for the free salvation brought to his knowledge by the blessed gospel of Christ; who seeks for mercy, with a trembling heart and with earnest desires, in the way, and through the name, which God has revealed: this man will surely be heard and accepted, when he breathes out, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" while the Pharisee, with his long prayers or boasted services, will remain under condemnation, "the wrath of God abiding on him." This is the path to honour, glory, immortality, and eternal life; whilst "pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." Let us then take heed, not to glory in ourselves, or to despise others; let us also be careful not to discourage the weak or the ignorant, or to deter men from coming themselves, or bringing their children, unto Christ; and let us recollect, that "except we receive the kingdom of God, as a little child, we shall in no wise enter therein."

V. 18—43. The best obedience of mere man to the holy commandments of God, must leave him under condemnation. We may accost one another as good, whether ignorantly, or as a hollow compliment; but in fact "there is none good, no not one," our glorious Emmanuel alone excepted. The higher any man's confidence is, that he has kept all the commandments, or any of them, from his youth; the more clearly does it appear, that he wants understanding as to the spiritual meaning of them; and that he is a stranger to repentance, to faith, to his own real character and heart, and his need of a gratuitous salvation. (Notes, Rom. 7:7—12.) Men's professed obedience also, when brought to the touchstone, will be found of no value in the sight of God: for the love of the world, in one form or other, lies at the root of their flourishing gourd, and will shortly wither it. Prosperity, authority, and reputation, conduce to feed this ruinous self-flattery, as well as an idolatrous attachment to earthly objects: many, who have serious thoughts, "depart very sorrowful," because they are rich, and unwilling to part with or to distribute their idolized treasures, at the command and for the sake of Christ. So that it would be impossible for "a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God," were it not, that "with him all things are possible."—Men in general are as backward to derive instruction from the humiliation, the crucifixion, and the resurrection of Christ, as the disciples were to regard his declarations concerning those events: and for the same reason; even because self-love and a desire of worldly objects close their understandings, and warp their judgments. Thus they are left in the dark about the evident meaning of the Scriptures; while they perplex or amuse themselves and others, by endeavouring to find out some hidden sense, which accords better to their preconceived opinions. Were it not for this, all would see, that they would best consult their present comfort, as well as their eternal good, by renouncing every earthly possession or enjoyment, at Christ's command and for his sake.—Would we then rightly understand these things, we must come to him, like the blind man, earnestly beseeching him to open our eyes, and to show us, more and more clearly, the excellency of his precepts, and the preciousness of his salvation: and then, being saved by our faith, we shall learn to follow him, glorifying God: and his other disciples also, witnessing the change, will praise God continually on our behalf. (Note, Gal. 1:15—24, vv. 23,24.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XIX. V. 1—10. Zaccheus seems to have farmed the revenue of a certain district: so that he was "the chief among the publicans," in that neighbourhood; having many others under him, who either rented of him smaller portions, or were employed as his servants to collect the taxes. It is probable, that he possessed considerable property, before he engaged in this employment; as large securities were required of those who farmed the taxes under the Roman governors: but he had doubtless greatly increased his wealth by his lucrative occupation. (Marg. Ref. a, b.)—It does not appear, that he had previously any serious concern about religion: and his contrivance to get a sight of Jesus was probably the result of curiosity, which the miracle just before wrought on Bartimeus could not fail to increase. In what manner the words of our Lord affected his mind, we cannot tell; but without all doubt, they were attended with a divine influence, to humble and change his heart, and to make way for true repentance and living faith: he therefore gladly welcomed Christ, and doubtless was further instructed, convinced, and determined, by his discourse. Whilst the Pharisees and others, as usual, murmured at our Lord's thus inviting himself to be the guest of a man "who was a sinner," (Note, 15:1,2.) whose employment and character were infamous; and this in preference to any of the priests or Levites, who resided there; (Note, 10:30—37, v. 31.) Zaccheus stood forth in the midst of the company, and, avowing the change which had taken place in his mind and heart, his judgment and disposition, he professed his purpose of immediately devoting half his wealth to charitable uses, and of making fourfold restitution to all those whom he had wronged. The publicans were used to charge the people more than the real amount of their taxes; and then if they refused to pay it, they "falsely accused them" to the Romans, as disobedient to their authority: thus they obtained the assistance of the military to enforce their exorbitant demands: (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, 3:10—14.) in every instance in which Zaccheus had thus, or in any other manner, oppressed and injured any man, he was determined to make the utmost restitution required by the law, in case of concealed theft. (Marg. Ref. p.)—It has been argued, that he could not have got much of his wealth by extortion; or his estate would not have sufficed for such a restitution, after half of it had been given to the poor; especially if he reserved any part of it for himself. But it is more reasonable to suppose, that he did not give half to the poor, till after restitution had been made; as he could not previously consider his riches as his own, even to give away. (Is. 61:8.) Perhaps he lay under a worse character than he really deserved: yet the transaction seems to be purposely recorded as an illustrious triumph of mercy and grace; (18:24—27. Note, Matt. 19:23—26.) and the whole narration implies that he was before a man who bore a bad character.—But Jesus, knowing the sincerity and humility of his professed subjection to the gospel, declared, "that salvation was that day come to his house:" he and his family had been before estranged from it, but it was now come thither for the benefit of all belonging to it; "forsomuch as he also was a son of Abraham," not only according to the flesh, but as being now made partaker of Abraham's faith and privileges, and the promises made to him and his seed. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 17:7,8. 18:18,19. Jer. 32:39—41. Acts 2:37—40, v. 39. Rom. 4:9—17. 11:16—21.) This was indeed the very end for which he, "the Son of man," was come into the world, even to "seek out and save 11 ¶ And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because [t]they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear.

12 He said therefore, [u]A certain nobleman went into [x]a far country, [y]to receive for himself a kingdom, [z]and to return.

13 And he called [a]his ten servants, and [b]delivered them ten [c]pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come.

14 But [d]his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us.

15 And it came to pass, that when he was returned, [e]having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, [f]that he might know how much every man had gained by trading.

16 Then came the first, saying, [g]Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds.

17 And he said unto him, [h]Well, thou good servant: because thou hast [i]been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities.

18 And the second came, saying, Lord, [k]thy pound hath gained five pounds.

19 And he said likewise to him, [l]Be thou also over five cities.

20 And another came, saying, [m]Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin.

21 For [n]I feared thee, [o]because thou art an austere man; thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow.

22 And he saith unto him, [p]Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. [q]Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow.

23 Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with [r]usury?

24 And he said unto them that stood by, [s]Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds.

25 (And they said unto him, [t]Lord, he hath ten pounds.)

26 For I say unto you, [u]That unto every one which hath shall be given: [v]and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him.

27 But those [x]mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me. [Practical Observations.]

28 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, [y]he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem.

29 And it came to pass, [z]when he was come nigh to Bethphage and [a]Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples,

V. 11—27. Our Lord now drew near to Jerusalem; and his attendants, who were numerous, supposed that he was about to avow himself the Messiah, and to set up his kingdom, in outward authority and majesty: (Note, 17:20—23.) but to obviate this erroneous conclusion, he gave them a parabolical representation of what was about to take place in those respects. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 25:14—30.) The "nobleman" evidently signifies Christ himself, ascending into heaven to be exalted on the mediatorial throne, till his coming to judgment. The "ten servants" denote his professed disciples, who were few in comparison of the multitudes of his enemies, or of his subjects in the heavenly world. The "pound," given to each of them to "occupy," or trade with, till his return, represents the gifts, abilities, or possessions intrusted to each person; with the means of grace, and encouragements and advantages for improvement, vouchsafed him: in the proper use of which, they prove themselves faithful servants, glorify their Lord, and do good, during their continuance on earth. (Note, 16:1—8.) The "citizens who hated him," represent especially the Jewish nation, who hated the doctrine and kingdom of Christ, and did all they could to prevent its establishment. (Notes, Ps. 2:1—6.)—It was very common for ambassadors to be sent to Rome by cities and states, to oppose such as sought there an appointment to be king over them. His "return" after he had received the kingdom, which his enemies could not prevent, had reference to his coming to take vengeance on the Jews: but it also represents the final judgment of all men. The account required, accords almost exactly with what has been already considered: except that, with the same sum intrusted, some servants had gained more, some less; and they were rewarded in proportion, by being appointed rulers under him over the cities of his kingdom; and that the punishment of the avowed enemies of Christ, as well as that of hypocritical professors of the gospel, is represented.—Went unto. (12) 'This probably refers to the history of Archelaus, who after the death of his father, Herod the great, went to Rome, to receive from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will, by which he had the kingdom of Judea left to him.' Bp. Porteus. As, however, considerably more than thirty years had elapsed, since the death of Herod the great, when our Lord spake this parable; and as Archelaus was deposed and banished for his tyranny, after he had reigned ten years; it is not likely that his case was especially alluded to. But most of the kings of the east, in those times, were vassals to the Romans; so that the next heir seldom ventured to ascend the vacant throne, without their permission: and, in many instances, it was needful to travel to Rome; and very heavy expenses, and tedious delays, generally preceded even a favourable decision. To this case, which frequently occurred, and was familiar to the hearers, perhaps our Lord intended to make some distant allusion.—'There are three sorts of men in the church: first, those who know not Christ, and revolt from him: secondly, those who, according to their own vocation, diligently and zealously use those things which he has given them to his glory, and the good of their neighbours: and thirdly, those who are benumbed by indolence, and do no good. When the Lord shall come, ... he will inflict righteous vengeance on the first: he will bless the second in proportion to the labours which they have sustained: and he will also punish the last as useless; even those who waste an indolent life in deliberation and speculat on.' Beza.

31 And if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because [c]the Lord hath need of him.

32 And they that were sent went their way, and found even as he had said unto them.

33 And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt?

34 And they said, [d]The Lord hath need of him.

35 And they brought him to Jesus: and [e]they cast their garments upon the colt, and they set Jesus thereon.

36 And as they went, they spread their clothes in the way.

44 And shall [u]lay thee even with the ground, and [x]thy children within thee; and they shall not [y]leave in thee one stone upon another; [z]because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation.

45 ¶ And he [a]went into the temple, and began to cast out them that [b]sold therein, and them that bought;

46 Saying unto them, [c]It is written, my house is the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves.

47 ¶ And [d]he taught daily in the temple. But [e]the chief priests, and the scribes, and the chief of the people sought to destroy him; as strange, as if the very stones should speak, and declare him to be "the King of Israel," and "the Lord of glory." The expression was proverbial; but the calling of the Gentiles seems to have been alluded to. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Hab. 2:9—11. Matt. 3:7—10. 27:51—53.)—It is observable, that towards the close of his life, our Lord gradually laid aside that reserve which he before used. He no longer enjoined silence on those who were healed by him: and in this instance he expressly declared himself to be "the Son of David" and "the King of Israel." His time was now come; and the reasons for his former caution no longer existed.—'When they linger, who ought to be the chief preachers and setters forth of the kingdom of God; he will raise up others extraordinarily, in despite of them.' Beza.

V. 41—44. When Jesus approached Jerusalem, and had a clear view, from the adjacent hills, of its magnificence and prosperity; instead of being alarmed by the prospect of those inexpressible sufferings, and deep indignities which there awaited him, or expressing resentment for the base usage which he was about to experience; he foresaw the miseries coming on that ungrateful and persecuting city, by the awful justice of God, with tears of deep compassion: (Note, John 11:33—40. P. O. 28—40.) saying, as with a wish or ardent desire, expressive of his deep concern, "if thou hadst," or "Oh! that thou hadst known, in this thy day," (the time when the city was honoured and favoured with the presence of her King, Messiah, the Son of God,) "the things which belonged to thy peace!" (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Deut. 5:28,29. 32:29. Ps. 81:13. Is. 48:17—19.) But that day was expired, her doom was passed, her eyes were blinded, and every thing conducive to her welfare was judicially kept out of sight. Our Lord therefore concluded with predicting in the most explicit language, the siege and entire destruction of the city, and the dire havoc made of its devoted inhabitants; because they knew not the time of their gracious visitation, but rejected, and were about to crucify, their King. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:12.) 'Christ is not simply delighted with the destruction, no not of the wicked.' Beza. The possibility, nay, the actual existence, of an union between awful inflexible justice denouncing sentence against the criminal, and benevolence sympathizing in his misery, even to tears, is most affectingly shown in this passage. So that it stands as an unanswerable refutation of the charges, which are constantly brought against those who denounce the vengeance of God on impenitent sinners, as if they must of course be actuated by malevolence. All such accusations involve the Saviour himself, as well as the prophets and apostles, along with modern teachers and professors of Christianity, under one general condemnation. (Notes, Jer. 9:1,2. 10,11. 17:15—18. Ez. 18:23. 33:11. Rom. 9:1—3.)—The language of the original is abrupt and interrupted; and peculiarly suited to show the deep interest, which the Speaker took in the concerns of those about whom he was discoursing.—'If after slaying so many prophets, and so often refusing the Lord of the prophets; in this my last coming to thee, thou hadst had any regard to thyself!' Beza. 'When Vespasian besieged Jerusalem, his army compassed the city round about, and kept them in on every side. And though it was judged a great and almost impracticable work, to compass the whole city with a wall; yet Titus animating his soldiers to attempt it, they in three days built a wall of thirty-nine furlongs, having thirteen castles in it; and so cut off all hopes that any of the Jews within the city should escape. . . . Titus having commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, this was so fully done, by levelling the whole compass of it, except three towers, . . . that they who came to see it, were persuaded it never would be built again.' Josephus, quoted by Whitby. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Our Lord illustrates by facts, what he declares in words, concerning the omnipotency of his grace, and the exceeding riches of his pardoning mercy. Many are brought to the places where Jesus dispenses his blessings, without any design of obtaining a share of them: and curiosity, though idle and vain, is often overruled to bring men acquainted with the gospel. Whatever puts a sinner, as it were, in the Saviour's way, is a probable means of doing him good. Where the gospel is preached, Jesus "stands and knocks at the door" of a man's heart, demanding admission, proposing to be his guest, and promising a royal recompense for his entertainment: (Note, Rev. 3:20—22. P. O. 14—22.) but unless grace prepare the heart, no one will "make haste to receive him joyfully:" when therefore this event takes place, though Pharisees murmur, yet angels rejoice, adoring the Redeemer's condescension, and congratulating the sinner's felicity.—Repentance is not to be estimated by terrors or distresses, but by its effects: where it is genuine a new judgment and disposition are produced, a new character is formed, and a new life is entered on. The penitent gladly

CHAPTER XX.

Jesus answers those who demand by what authority he acts, 1—8; speaks the parable of the vineyard let out to wicked husbandmen, 9—18; shows that tribute should be paid to Cæsar, 19—26; confutes the Sadducees, concerning the resurrection of the dead; and puts all his adversaries to silence, 27—40; inquires how Christ was both David's Son, and David's Lord, 41—44; and warns the people against the ambitious and hypocritical scribes, 45—47.

AND it came to pass, [a]that on one of those days, as he taught the people in the temple, and preached the gospel, [b]the chief priests and the scribes came upon him, with the elders,

2 And spake unto him, saying, [c]Tell us, By what authority doest thou these things? or, [d]Who is he that gave thee this authority?

3 And he answered and said unto them, [e]I will also ask you one thing; and answer me.

4 The [f]baptism of John, was it [g]from heaven, or of men?

5 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, [h]Why then believed ye him not?

6 But and if we say, Of men; [i]all the people will stone us: [k]for they be persuaded that John was a prophet.

7 And they answered, [l]That they could not tell whence it was.

8 And Jesus said unto them, [m]Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

9 ¶ Then began he to speak to the people [n]this parable: A certain man [o]planted a vineyard, [p]and let it forth to [q]husbandmen, and [r]went into a far country for a long time.

10 And at [s]the season he [t]sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the husbandmen [u]beat him, and sent him away empty.

11 And again he sent another servant; and they beat him also, and [x]entreated him shamefully, [y]and sent him away empty.

12 And again he sent the third: and they wounded him also, and cast him out.

13 Then said the lord of the vineyard, [z]What shall I do? [a]I will send my beloved son: [b]it may be they will reverence him when they see him.

14 But when the husbandmen saw him, they [c]reasoned among themselves, saying, This is [d]the welcomes the Saviour; and while he accepts of his free salvation, he devotes himself to his service. If he possess wealth, he will immediately think of becoming a faithful steward: though he may not be called actually to leave all, and follow his Lord; yet he will begin, without any express command, to employ a considerable part of it in charitable uses, according to the degree of his faith and love: and if conscious of having defrauded others, he will not count any thing his own, till he has made ample restitution, according to his ability and opportunity. When we see such "fruits meet for repentance," we may conclude that salvation is come to the sinner's heart, and that he is become "a son of Abraham" by faith in Jesus Christ: and we may cheerfully hope that mercy is intended to his family also. What thanks then do we owe to him, who "came to seek and save the lost!" If we are in the way of salvation, he has ransomed our souls, sought us out, and saved us; and the same way is open even to extortioners and harlots: we should therefore gladly use every scriptural means, or countenance every scriptural endeavour, to promote the preaching of the gospel, to sinners of every description; for all objections to designs of this kind, arise from the dominion, or the remainder, of pharisaical pride and self-preference. (Note, and P. O. 15: 25—32.)

V. 11—27. It behooves us carefully to study the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom, that we may understand our present situation, and form just expectations in respect of the future. Our blessed Lord is indeed established on his glorious throne; and it is vain to send a message after him, refusing submission to his authority: yet many, even from professed regard to the honour and worship of God, (like the Jews of old,) speak as if this was left to their option. They seem to think, that they may choose their own way of approaching God, or entering heaven; and determine for themselves by what Judge, or according to what rule, their final doom shall be determined. But these things are immutably settled; and all, who will not have the Saviour "to reign over them," shall be punished as enemies to his Person and kingdom; of which awful doom, the vengeance executed on the unbelieving Jews was an earnest and an example.—He has indeed "received a kingdom;" and will certainly "return:" but he is now unseen, except by faith; so that true believers alone act as in his presence, and as expecting and preparing for his coming. (Notes, Phil. 3:20,21. 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Tit. 2:13. Heb. 9:27,28. 2 Pet. 3:1—4,10—13.) Alas! the number, even of his professed servants, is very small, in proportion to that of his enemies; and their ability is often little, compared to the talents and possessions which ungodly men abuse. Yet if, in humble faith, cheerful diligence, and patient hope, they "occupy" with that little, till their Lord comes; their reward shall be exceedingly great, and exactly proportioned to the improvement made: though every faithful servant will allow that the power, the opportunity, and the will to improve them, were wholly from the Lord; and that "his pound hath gained the ten pounds." (Note, 1 Chr. 29:9—19.) This union of faithfulness, and diligence, and humility, ensures a gracious acceptance: to persons of this character "the Lord when he cometh" will say, "Well, thou good servant; because thou hast been faithful in a little, have thou authority over ten cities." Whilst these views of the Redeemer's abundant grace encourage the humble believer to increasing diligence; hypocrites are deterred from activity by hard thoughts of him, and a persuasion that his service is unprofitable. But, whatever excuses and pleas such men now make for their indolence or avarice, their mouths will soon be stopped; and their unimproved advantages will be taken from them, to enrich the faithful servants. "For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him." (P. O. Matt. 25:14—30.)

V. 28—48. Would we "have confidence before Christ at his coming," we should now observe his directions, and rely on his promises; and when "the Lord hath need of" aught belonging to us, we should readily devote it to his service.—But what will be the feelings of the multitude of the disciples, when they shall behold their Lord and Saviour return in his glory to judge the world! How will they then "rejoice and praise God, with a loud voice, for all the mighty works which they have seen!" In anticipation of this joy, let us now gladly welcome every display of his grace, in the conversion of sinners and the success of his gospel; exulting in the triumphs of our "King, who cometh in the name of the Lord," and rejoicing that "there is glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will to men."—Those who continue to object to these songs of adoring and thankful praise to the Redeemer, will wail and lament when he shall appear to complete his people's salvation; and if there were none on earth to adore the display of the divine perfections, in the work of our redemption, "the very stones would cry out," and upbraid the ingratitude and insensibility of mankind.—But who can behold the holy Jesus weeping over the city, where his precious blood was about to be shed, in the prospect of the miseries awaiting his insulting murderers, without perceiving that the image of God, in human nature, consists very much in expanded benevolence and tender compassion to the miserable, even when their miseries are most justly deserved? Surely, then, those persons, who take up certain doctrines of the gospel in such a manner as to have their hearts rendered by them more callous towards their fellow-sinners; and who (from topics grounded on God's secret purposes) object to compassion for perishing sinners, or prayers for men in general, have far more of the Pharisee in them, than of "the mind that was in Christ Jesus!"—But let every one apply his mind to know, "in the day of his visitation," "the things which belong to his eternal peace:" for though Jesus wept over Jerusalem, yet he did not fail to execute vengeance upon it: and though "he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live;" yet he will surely accomplish his most awful threatenings on all who "neglect his great salvation." May he then come, and cleanse our hearts by his Spirit, that they may be a holy temple unto the Lord! May he purify his church and his holy ordinances, from all those practices and persons which pervert or defile them! May his obstinate enemies be disappointed, and not find what to do; while sinners on every side become attentive to his words of truth and salvation! (P. O. Matt. 21:1—11. 23:34—39.)

heir come, [c]let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours.

15 So [d]they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. [e]What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them?

16 He shall come and [h]destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they said, God forbid.

17 And he [i]beheld them, and said, [k]What is this then that is written, [l]The Stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the Head of the corner?

18 Whosoever [m]shall fall upon that Stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. [Practical Observations.]

19 ¶ And the chief priests and the scribes, [n]the same hour, sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that he had spoken this parable against them.

20 And [o]they watched him, and sent forth spies, which should [p]feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so [q]they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor.

21 And they asked him, saying, [r]Master, we know that thou [s]sayest and teachest rightly, neither [t]acceptest thou the person of any, but teachest the way of God [u]truly:

22 Is it [v]lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar, or no?

23 But [w]he perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, [x]Why tempt ye me?

24 Show me [y]a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, [z]Cæsar's.

25 And he said unto them, [a]Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's, and [b]unto God the things which be God's.

26 And [c]they could not take hold of his words before the people; [d]and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace.

27 ¶ Then came to him certain of [e]the Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection; and they asked him, 28 Saying, Master. [f]Moses wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die without children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

29 There were therefore seven brethren: and the first took a wife, [g]and died without children.

30 And the second took her to wife, and he died childless.

31 And the third took her; and in like manner the seven also: and they left no children, and died.

32 Last of all the woman [h]died also.

33 Therefore [i]in the resurrection, whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife.

34 And Jesus answering said unto them, [k]The children of this world [l]marry, and are given in marriage:

35 But they which shall be [m]accounted worthy [n]to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, [o]neither marry, nor are given in marriage:

36 Neither [p]can they die any more: for [q]they are equal unto the angels: and are [r]the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

37 Now that the dead are raised, [s]even Moses showed at the bush, [t]when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.

bable, that the owner of a vineyard would suffer the murderers of his son to keep the inheritance, if he had power to dispossess and punish them. This circumstance, therefore, pointed out the extreme folly, as well as the detestable wickedness of the priests and rulers in that conduct on which they had determined.—He, &c. (16) The scribes allowed, that the husbandmen deserved the most dreadful punishment: but when they found that our Lord applied it to them, and condemned them according to their own verdict, (as "Nathan said unto David, Thou art the man,") they said, "God forbid." They neither allowed their guilt, nor apprehended any such consequences from their conduct.—On whom. (18) The persevering opposition of the Roman empire, in all its forms, and in every age, to Christ and his cause, and the final and dreadful destruction of it, may here be predicted, along with the calamities and miseries of the Jews. (Notes, Dan. 2:34—45. Zech. 14:1—3.)—The dreadful punishment of all persecutors is also intimated.

'The last refuge that false prophets have to destroy the true prophets, is to lay treason and sedition to their charge.' Beza.—'They put to him the question about paying tribute to Cæsar; hoping, that by denying it to be due to him from the Jews, they might accuse him as an enemy to Cæsar; for they knew, that his decision of questions, relating only to their law and controversies, would not offend those Gallios.' Whitby.—It would be well, if all who are insiduously watched and questioned on such subjects, would imitate our Lord's conduct; neither intermeddling with disputable political subjects, nor maintaining a suspicious silence; but plainly showing, that obedience and tribute should be rendered, even to usurpers and heathens, while possessed of authority; except where the higher obligation of obedience to God requires the contrary.

Hence doth the Scripture say of them, that "they are passed from death unto life;" (John 5:24.) because Christ "will raise them up at the last day." (John 6:40.) God here styles himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; that is, not of their souls only, but of their persons; in which sense the Jews always understood these words: now thus he would be the God of the dead, though their souls lived, unless their bodies also rose again.' Whitby.—God is not the God of the dead: but he is "the God of Abraham, &c." therefore Abraham now lives, as to his soul, and shall awake, as to the body, at the resurrection, like one out of sleep: for, if "God

CHAPTER XXI.

Christ prefers the widow's two mites to the large offerings of the rich, 1—4. He foretells the destruction of the temple, 5, 6; the signs and calamities which would precede and accompany it, giving suitable exhortations and promises, 7—19; and the destruction and continued desolations of Jerusalem, 20—24. The signs of his coming, 25—33. He exhorts to watchfulness and prayer, 34—36. He daily preaches at the temple; and retires at night to the mount of Olives, 37, 38.

AND he looked up, [a]and saw the rich men casting their gifts into [b]the treasury.

2 And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two [c]mites.

3 And he said, [c]Of a truth I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast in [d]more than they all:

4 For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in [e]all the living that she had.

5 ¶ And [f]as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, he said,

6 As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which [g]there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. Men often profess to inquire into the evidences or doctrines of Revelation; when they are secretly determined not to submit to its authority, and are, in fact, only seeking plausible apologies for their infidelity and disobedience. But the fear of man, and regard to reputation, deter them from avowing their real sentiments and purposes. Objectors of this character should be answered with pertinence, brevity, and caution. It is doing them too much honour, in general, to enter into a formal controversy with them; the best way is to address their consciences by apt illustrations, closely applied; and so to detect those corrupt affections or secret sins, which are the real grounds of their dislike to the Bible, but which they endeavour to conceal even from themselves.—"They flatter themselves in their own sight, until their iniquity be found to be hateful." In this way it may often be shown, that they resemble in pride, perverseness, ingratitude, enmity to God, and aversion to his holy service, those men who murdered the prophets, and crucified the Son of God; in order to establish their own authority and reputation, and to live according to their own ungodly lusts without control—But it becomes every one of us who are favoured with the word and ordinances of God, to inquire, whether we make a proper and adequate improvement of our advantages, and act consistently with our professed subjection to the gospel. For awful will be the doom, not only of builders that reject him who is "the Head-Stone of the corner," but of those who profess to "reverence the Son," and yet render not the fruits of the vineyard in due season. (P. O. Matt. 21:23—46. 22:15—22.)

V. 19—47. When ministers succeed in bringing the word of God home to the consciences of obstinate transgressors, these will surely be exasperated: and in return they will watch their opportunity, and assume every disguise, to fasten some charge upon the character of the ministers, or to expose them to the displeasure of the ruler. But "the wisdom from above" will direct those, who "teach the way of God truly," to avoid their snares: and they will instruct men in their duty to God, to the king, and to all men, in so clear a manner, that "such as are of the contrary part can have no evil thing to say of them."—Ungodly men continually grow more and more like to "their father the devil, and the lusts of their father they will do:" but let us seek to be daily "transformed in the renewing of our minds," that we may be counted worthy to obtain the heavenly inheritance, and be made meet to be partakers of it; where we shall be "equal to the angels, as the children of God, and the children of the resurrection;" and where "the Lord himself will be our everlasting Light" and our all-sufficient Portion. "Thither our Forerunner," the Son of David and his Lord, "hath for us entered," "who is at the right hand of God," and shall there remain till "all enemies are put under his feet." Let us therefore fear being found among his enemies: as all hypocrites, infidels, and profligates most certainly will be: and let us pray to God continually to preserve us from pride, ambition, covetousness, and every evil thing; and to teach us to seek that "honour which cometh from him alone." (P. O. Matt. 22:23—46. 23:1—12.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XXI. V. 1—4. (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 12:41—44.) 'This treasury received the voluntary oblations of the worshippers, who came up to the feasts; and the money thrown into it was employed to buy wood for the altar, salt, and other necessaries, not provided for in any other way.' Doddridge.—It is probable, that the public sacrifices, and the incense, were bought with this money; and that part of it was often expended in repairing the temple and its out-buildings. The worshippers from a distance might be the principal persons, who cast money into it at the great feasts: but it does not appear that it was exclusively intended for them.

ἐνατίζημι, and include the same general idea of being devoted to God, one as employed in his service, the other as a sacrifice to his justice.

V. 6. Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 24:1,2.—These, &c.] "As for these things, which ye behold, &c." The manner and language emphatically show the holy indifference of our Lord to all external magnificence. The disciples, not much accustomed to splendour and grandeur, expressed great admiration; and probably were disposed to think, that true religion was closely connected with these externals, or promoted by them. But the spiritual mind of our Lord, in both respects, disregarded them; being wholly occupied by things of a far more sublime and heavenly nature. (Note, John 4:21—24.)

V. 7—11. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 24:3—8. Mark 13:1—8.—The time, &c. (8) The time when the deceivers would come in the name of Christ; that is, each of them professing to be the promised Messiah.—Fearful. (11) Josephus gives a very particular account of many terrible appearances in the heavens; as a comet, like a flaming sword waving over Jerusalem, and the appearance of contending armies in the air.—'The great gate of the temple, which twenty men could scarcely shut, and which was made fast with bolts and bars, was seen ... to open of its own accord, to let in their enemies: for so, saith he, our wise men construed this omen.... At the feast of Pentecost, when the priests went at midnight into the temple to attend their service, they first heard a kind of noise, as of a movement from the place, and then a voice, saying, ... Let us go hence.... Four years before the war, one Jesus began at the feast of tabernacles to cry, ... 'A voice against Jerusalem and the temple; a voice against all the people, Woe, woe unto them;' and he continued crying thus about seven years.... These things Tacitus, a Roman historian, doth thus epitomize: 'Armies seemed to meet in the clouds. Weapons were there seen glittering; the temple seemed to be on a flame, with fire issuing from the clouds, and a divine voice was heard, that the Deity was quitting the place; and a great motion, as of his departing.'' Whithy, on Matt. 24:7,8. Josephus was a Jew, who never embraced Christianity, and Tacitus a learned Gentile, who hated and vilified it.—These and many other extraordinary events excited great consternation among the Jews, and were intimations of their approaching miseries.

Yet Jesus, during his lowest humiliation on earth, in the most express and explicit terms, promised to give his disciples "a mouth and wisdom, which all their adversaries should not be able to gainsay or resist." Such texts are seldom adduced in controversies on our Lord's Deity, or on the doctrine of the Trinity; but they are of immense importance in settling them: and the inference from them cannot be evaded in the same manner, which some use, with more plausibility, against express declarations on these subjects. For the learned and ingenious opponents of these great mysteries of Christianity, have long been employed in searching for other readings, or specious criticisms, on those texts which form the grand pillars of our system; but they are not so well prepared to answer unexpected arguments. Most certainly, however, our Lord here promises to perform the work of God, which other Scriptures declare incommunicably to belong to him; yet the same things are also ascribed to the Holy Spirit: and unbiassed common sense will show any man, what the conclusion must be, according to the Sacred Oracles.—To gainsay.] 'Against which nothing can be said which has the appearance of truth.' Grotius.—Hair, &c. (18) (Marg. Ref. b.) 'This, saith Grotius, is a proverbial expression, used 1 Sam. 14:45. 2 Sam. 14:11. 1 Kings 1:52. Acts 27:34. signifying that they should sustain no loss, all circumstances considered; for to suffer some loss for the present, to gain eternal life, is the greatest advantage.... But I cannot acquiesce in this interpretation;... because this proverb, in all the places cited, contains a promise, that the persons spoken to should not die, or perish in the danger they lay under.... Christ therefore seems to promise, that whatever might befall them at other times, yet in these "days of vengeance" upon the Jews, or at the time of the destruction of the city and of the temple, none of those Christians who endured to the end should perish in that siege.' Whithy. (Note, Matt. 24:15—18.)—In your patience, &c. (19) The apostles and other Christians were here exhorted to exercise patient resignation to the will of God, patience and perseverance in waiting the performance of his promises, patient continuance in well-doing, and meek long-suffering under injuries. (Notes, 8:4—15, v. 15. Rom. 2:7—11, v. 7. Jam. 5:7,8.) This would be "their patience," required of them and peculiar to them; by means of it they would "possess their souls:" they would be enabled to preserve the calmness and cheerfulness of their minds, and thus have a comfortable enjoyment of life amid their troubles; and be kept from violent terrors and unruly passions, and from being driven from their hope in God, and obedience to him, to deeds of desperation. For self-murderers, in one way or other, lose "possession of their souls," whether by insanity or despair; and generally through want of patient submission to the will of God.

saying, "When ye see the abomination of desolation, &c."—Midst of it, &c. (21) That is, Jerusalem, mentioned in the preceding verse.—Days of vengeance. (22) Notes, Lev. 26: 14—40. Deut. 4:25—28. 28:49—67. Ps. 69:22—28. Dan. 9:25—27. Zech. 11:1—3. Mal. 4:1.—Fall, &c. (24) Eleven hundred thousand Jews are recorded to have fallen in the siege of Jerusalem, besides great multitudes in other places: nearly a hundred thousand were sold for slaves, and reduced to the most abject captivity in distant countries: the remains of that devoted nation have been dispersed as captives, or in a most dependent oppressed condition, throughout the kingdoms of the earth; and yet have been preserved a distinct people for above one thousand seven hundred years! (Notes, Num. 23: 9. Jer. 30:10,11.) This unparalleled event was doubtless intended, among other reasons, that they might be undeniable witnesses or monuments of the truth of the Scriptures; of that part which they reject, as well as of that which they retain. Jerusalem has ever since been "trodden under foot," or governed with despotic sway, by the Gentiles; by the Romans, Saracens, Mamaluks, Franks, and Turks, who possess it to this day. A law was made by the Roman victors, forbidding any Jew to dwell in their ancient inheritance, or to come within sight of Jerusalem: the foundations of the old city were ploughed up; a new city was at length builded by the conquerors, called Ælia, and an idolatrous temple was erected in the place where the temple of JEHOVAH had stood. In the days of Constantine and afterwards, the city was indeed possessed by Christians among others; but they were chiefly the Gentile converts, and the Jews were driven thence with great severity. Julian the Roman emperor, an apostate from Christianity, attempted to rebuild the temple, and to induce the Jews to settle there again, in avowed contempt and defiance of this prophecy; but his impious attempt was repeatedly frustrated, by the eruption of balls of fire from the earth, which destroyed his workmen. Great pains were taken some ages after, and many bloody wars, called the crusades,' were waged, in order to rescue this "holy city" from the hands of the infidels, and to establish there a Christian empire: but the success of these ruinous and infatuated wars was always very imperfect and short-lived; and, in general, Mohammedans (who are Gentiles, neither Jews nor Christians) have had possession of it: the few Christians who reside there have little more of their religion than the name, and are most grievously oppressed by the Turks: and "the Jews," as a people, who are especially to be opposed to the Gentiles, have generally been driven from their ancient city, though many may now be found there.—"The times of the Gentiles" seem to signify the times during which the Gentiles are permitted to keep possession of Jerusalem, namely, till the Jews be converted to Christ: then their "times will be fulfilled;" probably the Jews will be restored to their own land, and vengeance will be taken on those who oppose their return: (Notes, Ez. 34:23—31. 36:25—38. 37:25—28. 38:39. Dan. 11:40—45. Am. 9:13—15. Zech. 14:) for these events seem to be predicted, as introductory to the calling of the nations into the church. (Note, Rom. 11:15—22, vv. 15—25.)—Or, the times appointed for the calling of the Gentiles, or all nations, into the church may be meant. When this is arrived, or just at hand, the Jews will recover their holy city.—This prediction, however, has already been so remarkably accomplished, that it may be said to contain a full demonstration of the truth of the Christian religion. No human or created sagacity could have foreseen such remote events; no conjecture could have been formed of them. It must have previously been supposed, that, if the Jews were dispersed among all nations, they would be incorporated among them. Their preservation as a distinct people, neither Christians nor idolaters, in the midst of their several conquerors and oppressors, being Christians or idolaters, is an event which has no parallel in the annals of the world; an event that could never have been expected or thought of, if prophecy from the days of Moses had not excited that expectation; an event which is a sure pledge of the accomplishment of all the other prophecies concerning this extraordinary people, as well as a preparation for it. (Note, Hos. 3:4,5.)—It is observed by many expositors, that all the three evangelists who recorded these predictions were dead, before Jerusalem was destroyed. This is indeed true, as far as we can learn from history; yet some may doubt of it. But the fulfilment of the prophecy to this present day conveys the most unanswerable proof of its divine original; and I am verily convinced, that if men were as impartial and unprejudiced in their religious inquiries, as they are in mathematical reasonings, no one who well considered this prediction, and examined its accomplishment, could any more doubt of the truth of the gospel, than learned men do of the Theorems in Euclid.

V. 25—28. These expressions, of which some were literally verified in those events which preceded, attended, and followed the taking of Jerusalem; and others, figurative of the subversion of the Jewish civil and religious establishment; may also be considered as typical of the awful solemnities, which will usher in the appearance of Christ to judge the world. And as the ruin of the Jews procured deliverance to the Christians whom they had persecuted, and was therefore a ground of encouragement to them: so the tremendous events which make way for the "perdition of ungodly men," will introduce the complete redemption of believers from death and every enemy.—The ruin of the Jewish nation was attended by violent distractions and convulsions in the adjacent regions. CHAPTER XXII.

The priests and scribes determine to put Jesus to death, 1, 2. Judas bargains to betray him, 3—6. Two apostles prepare the passover, and Jesus eats it with the twelve, 7—18. He institutes the Lord's supper, 19, 20; points out the traitor, 21—23; checks the ambition of the disciples, and promises them an honourable station in his kingdom, 24—30. He shows Peter, that Satan desired to sift him and his brethren; but that his faith should not fail, though he would thrice deny him, 31—34; and instructs his disciples about their approaching dangers, 35—38. His agony and prayer in the garden, and his warnings to the apostles, 39—46. He is betrayed and apprehended, 47—49; heals him whose ear Peter cut off, 50—53; and is led to the high priest, 54. Peter thrice denies him, but bitterly repents, 55—62. Jesus is mocked, insulted, and condemned, 63—71.

NOW [a]the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover.

2 And [b]the chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him; for they feared the people.

3 Then [c]entered Satan into Judas surnamed Iscariot, [d]being of the number of the twelve.

4 And he [e]went his way, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them.

5 And they were glad, [f]and covenanted to give him money.

6 And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them, [*]in the absence of the multitude.

7 ¶ Then came [g]the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed.

8 And [h]he sent Peter and John, saying, [i]Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat.

9 And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare?

10 And he said unto them, [k]Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water: follow him into the house where he entereth in.

11 And ye shall say unto the goodman of the house, [l]The Master saith unto thee, [m]Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?

12 And [n]he shall show you [o]a large upper room furnished: there make ready.

13 And [p]they went and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover.

14 ¶ And [q]when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him.

15 And he said unto them, [†]With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer:

V. 34—36. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 12:35—48. Matt. 24:36—51. Mark 13:33—37.) Similar exhortations have been considered in the parallel scriptures, which may be understood as addressed to the primitive Christians, who were waiting for those awful events which had been foretold: but they are equally applicable to those great concerns in which all men alike are interested.—Every degree of excess in eating, drinking, and other animal indulgences, tends not only to oppress and disorder the body, but to stupify and darken the powers of the understanding, and to render the affections torpid and carnal. So that these sensualities, as well as the cares attending the pursuit of wealth, or anxiety about our temporal provision; and the desire of worldly honours and distinctions, unfit men for religious duties, and make way for the day of evil coming "upon them unawares," and should be most vigilantly avoided. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27, v. 27. 1 Thes. 5:1—11. 2 Pet. 1:10,11. 3:10—13.)—The Roman armies invaded Judea and besieged Jerusalem, when they were not expected; and the Jews were every where taken, as "a bird in the snare of the fowler:" in like manner, death surprises most "men that dwell on the face of the whole earth," in an unprepared state; and so will the day of judgment.

V. 37, 38. These verses show us in what manner our Lord spent the last days preceding his crucifixion. Early every morning he came to Jerusalem, and spent the day at the temple: and in the evening he retired to Bethany, probably to lodge at the house of Lazarus and his sisters.—The people, from curiosity, conviction, or expectation, early resorted to attend on his instructions: yet when he would not assume the outward dignity of the regal character, but suffered himself to be apprehended by his enemies, they turned against him and joined in demanding his crucifixion! (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19. Our gracious Lord particularly notices the small oblations which spring from the love of his name in the hearts of his poor people; because men are apt to despise and discourage them: "for man looketh at the outward appearance, but the LORD looketh at the heart." (P. O. Mark 12:35—44.)—The spiritual mind will not be satisfied except with a city and a temple, the foundations of which cannot be subverted, and the ornaments of which cannot be removed or defaced; foreseeing the time when "the fashion of this world will pass away."—Instead of curious inquiries and speculations, every wise man will take heed "that he be not deceived," or led to countenance deceivers, and so add energy to delusion, in the great concerns of eternity. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) Whatever calamities may be in the world, or persecutions in the church, "before the end come;" we are sure that it will be well with those who serve the Lord, and their very trials shall "turn to them for a testimony." We should therefore "settle it in our hearts" not to be anxious about these matters, or afraid lest we should be put to shame before our enemies: for the divine Saviour will give all his disciples "a mouth and wisdom, which none of their enemies shall be able to gainsay or resist."—Whatever treachery, cruelty, contempt, or enmity we may meet with from men of all sorts, for his name's sake, nothing can in the least harm us. Let us then "possess our souls in patience;" "knowing that we are hereunto called;" even to suffer patiently, as well as to be unwearied in doing good. (P. O. Matt. 24:1—15. Mark 13:1—23. Note, and P. O. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.)

V. 20—38. The performance of ancient prophecies is very encouraging to those who are waiting on God to perform his promises: for if "the days of vengeance 'arrived,' that all things which were written might be fulfilled;" surely the predictions of Zion's prosperity will also be accomplished; for our "God delighteth in mercy."—The scattered Jews around us unwillingly preach to us the truth of Christianity, and prove, that "though heaven and earth pass away, the words of Jesus shall not pass away:" and they may also remind us to pray for those times, when neither the literal nor the mystical Jerusalem shall any longer be trodden down by the Gentiles, and when both Jews and Gentiles shall be turned to the Lord. (Note, Rev. 11:1,2.)—If we would "lift up our heads, as knowing that our redemption draweth nigh," in those seasons when there shall be "distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth;" or in the day when "flesh and heart shall fail;" or when "the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and the Son of man shall be seen coming in a cloud, with power and great glory;" we must continually be expecting and preparing for those events. Even true Christians have great need to be warned "to take heed to themselves," that they may not, on any occasion, be drawn into excessive or inexpedient indulgence, or be entangled by worldly cares: otherwise those days may come upon them unawares, which as a snare surprise to their destruction the inhabitants of the earth. May we then watch and pray incessantly, that we may "be accounted worthy to escape" these fatal delusions; and "that we may be found" of Christ, when he cometh, "in peace, without spot and blameless." (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:11—15.) May we begin, employ, and conclude each of our days, in reading and hearing his word, obeying his precepts, and imitating his example, that whensoever he cometh we may "be found watching!" (P. O. Matt. 24:16—51. 25:1—13. Mark 13:24—37. 1 Thes. 5:1—11. 2 Pet. 3:9—18.)

V. 14—18. Jesus assuredly knew that this passover would bring on immediately his most intense and inexpressible

16 For I say unto you, [r]I will not any more eat thereof, [s]until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

17 And he [t]took the cup, [u]and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves.

18 For I say unto you, [x]I will not drink of [y]the fruit of the vine, [z]until the kingdom of God shall come.

19 And [a]he took bread, and [b]gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This [c]is my body which is [d]given for you: [e]this do in remembrance of me.

20 Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, [f]This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you.

21 But, behold, [g]the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table.

22 And [h]truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: [i]but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!

23 And they began to [k]inquire among themselves, which of them it was that should do this thing.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ And there was also [l]a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest.

25 And he said unto them, [m]The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors.

26 But [n]ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve.

27 For whether is [o]greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth.

28 Ye are they which have [p]continued with me in my temptations:

29 And [q]I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me;

30 That ye may [r]eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, [s]and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

sufferings: yet he ardently longed for its arrival, that he might enter on that conflict which would certainly end in a glorious victory, productive of the most happy consequences to his people to all eternity: and he desired to join with his disciples in that passover "before he suffered;" that he might more fully open his mind to them, and speak such things as would conduce to prepare them also for the trials which were before them. He likewise informed them, that he should no more partake of that sacred feast, till its typical meaning was fulfilled in his atoning sacrifice, the clear revelation of his gospel, and the establishment of his spiritual kingdom. (Notes, Ex. 12:3—14.) Having said this, he took the cup of wine, with which it was customary for the head of the family to begin the paschal supper; and, giving thanks for it and the mercies then commemorated, he directed his disciples to divide it among them; as he should no more drink of the fruit of the vine, till the kingdom of God should come, i. e. till the gospel dispensation should be introduced. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Note, Matt. 26:29.)—It is probable that Jesus made the same declaration, at giving the disciples the cup of wine, usually drunk in celebrating the passover; and when he gave them the cup in instituting the Lord's supper. Perhaps he tasted the former, as a part of the custom, though not required by the law: but he did not partake of the wine, used in appointing the sacramental memorial of his death.

(20) 'This was said after the paschal supper, to signify that this cup pertained not to the solemnity of the passover.' Whitby.—"The cup" is here put for the wine contained in it; and that is said to be "the new covenant in my blood," as representing the blood of Emmanuel. It is astonishing that, amidst language so undeniably figurative, one expression should have been so long, so extensively, and so pertinaciously, interpreted literally, in contradiction to Scripture, to fact, and to common sense.—As we are not under the ritual law, and as nothing in this respect is spoken in the New Testament; it does not appear, that unfermented bread is essential to the Lord's Supper: or that cutting the loaf is improper; though to break a portion of it at least seems more scriptural.—The passover was once celebrated by anticipation, before the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; and the Lord's supper, once before our ransom had been paid.

V. 21—23. Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 26:21—24.—As it was determined. (22) The other evangelists say, "as was written of him." It was written because it was determined: but as Judas betrayed Christ, neither because it was decreed that he should, of which he could know nothing; nor because it was so written, which assuredly he did not understand, or attend to, at the time; so neither the one nor the other interfered, in the smallest degree, with his free agency and accountableness, and consequently did not excuse his wicked conduct.—It is surprising that learned men should allow the system of prophecy to be consistent with man's free agency; and yet think the secret purposes of God inconsistent with it. Of predicted events we may know something; and this, in certain cases, may influence our conduct: but of secret decrees we can know nothing, previous to the accomplishing of them; and so it is impossible that they should be the motives of our actions, or form any excuse for our sins. And as the predicted event must infallibly take place, for "the Scripture cannot be broken;" this as certainly ensures the predicted conduct, in the persons concerned, if only foreseen, as if absolutely decreed. The objection therefore, on this ground, is unreasonable; but the Scriptures must decide which system is true.—'The decree of Providence, though it necessarily take place, yet does not excuse the crime of the instrument.' Beza.—This Calvin himself would have maintained.

V. 24—27. 'It is wonderful, Christ should not have answered, that Peter was he to whom all the rest must be subject, as a prince or head; if indeed Peter was placed in any degree of apostolical authority above the rest.' Beza.—This competition seems to have been secretly revived among the apostles, even at the last passover. The immediate introduction of "the kingdom of God" would be considered by them as implied in what our Lord had before spoken; and they overlooked all which he had said of his sufferings, as what they could not understand. He, however, saw the same ambition working in their hearts; and to repress it he had recourse to arguments similar to those which he had used on a former occasion. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 9:46—50. Matt. 18:1—6. 20:20—28. Mark 10:35—45.)—Exercise, &c. (25) Both the original words, here used, imply arbitrary domineering authority; like that of a slaveholder over his slaves. One of the most ambitious, cruel, and tyrannical of the Egyptian kings was called Ptolemæus Euergetes, 'the Benefactor:' but the apostles must not affect to be called benefactors, by assuming state or exercising dominion; but be ready for the meanest and lowest services, by which they might do real good to others; and this without excepting the senior or most eminent of them.—When our Lord said, that he "was among them as he that served;" he seems to have referred to the washing of the disciples' feet, which took place about the same time. V. 28—30. Our blessed Saviour would not countenance in the least the worldly ambition of his disciples; but he saw good to animate them with the prospect of an honour worthy of their most ardent desires. They had followed him, with persevering constancy, through all his humiliating trials, which were about to terminate in his crucifixion; and they would follow his example, and adhere to him, through all temptations even unto death. As a reward for their faithful attachment, he engaged, as by covenant, to assign them a kingdom; even as the Father had covenanted to give him a kingdom, when he had passed through his sufferings. He would there admit them to share the glory and felicity of his exaltation; even as a victorious monarch admits his valiant captains and chosen friends to feast with him at his own table; and he would also make them assessors with him in judgment, especially in passing sentence on the twelve tribes of Israel, who would reject their ministry as they had done his, and put most of them to death as they were about to crucify him. V. 31—34. Perhaps Peter was here called by his former name, Simon, because in the events referred to, his instability so little accorded to the signification of that which had been given him. (Notes, Matt. 16:18. John 1:35—42.) Our Lord addressed him in particular, and in a very emphatical manner; though the other apostles were in a measure concerned, and the pronoun is plural you, not thee. Satan, their adversary, had desired, and earnestly sought permission, and in some degree obtained it, to make his advantage of the approaching time of trial, and to assault them with most violent temptations. Probably he hoped completely to prevail against some of them; or to bring such a scandal on their characters, as might prevent their future usefulness, or grievously discourage and distress them. He wanted "to sift them as wheat;" or to agitate their minds by his inward suggestions, concurring with their outward perils and difficulties, as the wheat is tossed about in the sieve: (Marg. Ref. t—x. Note, Am. 9:7—10.) but, whatever his intentions were, the Lord meant to permit him, by these means, to prove them, and to overrule it for the increase of their purity. Their distress and peril would indeed be very great, and they would none of them be able to sustain the shock unmoved: but Peter especially would be so violently assaulted, that, if left to himself, he would fall, like Judas, to rise no more. But he, who denounced the traitor's doom before his crime was perpetrated, assured Peter, that "he had prayed for him, that his faith might not fail." Not fail, as strength does in sickness; but as life fails in death. His faith was grievously interrupted in its exercise and effects, when he denied his Lord: but the principle did not fail in his heart. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, Rom. 5:7—10. 8:32—34. 1 Pet. 1:2—5.) "The spirit of life" did not finally leave Peter, who was a believer, and whose conduct on a sudden temptation was entirely contrary to his real character, and his habitual purpose: though he no more strove with Judas, who was a hypocrite, and acted according to his true character, which he had hitherto concealed. Peter was speedily brought, in the renewed exercise of faith, to mourn for his sin, to hope in God's mercy, and to return to his service; but Judas was left to utter apostacy, despair, and suicide. (Notes, Matt. 13:20,21. 25:1—4. Rom. 7:15—17.) When Christ had given Peter this intimation of his merciful intentions respecting him; which doubtless afterwards gave support to his faith and hope, under the anguish of his bitter remorse after he had denied his Lord: he commanded him, when thus renewedly "converted," to strengthen his brethren." Accordingly, after his fall and recovery, he was peculiarly earnest in encouraging the disciples to hope for a happy event of their trials: and in animating them boldly to profess and preach the gospel: while the humiliating lessons, which he learned by those events, had a very salutary effect on his own spirit, and tended to qualify him especially for encouraging and warning the tempted, the fearful, the desponding, or the fallen, even to the end of his days. The discerning reader will perceive the traces of it in his epistles.—Peter, however, was not at this time prepared to attend to his Lord's warnings, being confident of his good intentions, and foolishly disposed to "trust in his own heart." (Notes, Matt. 26:30—35. Mark 14:17—30. John 13:36—38.)—'It was certainly Peter's advantage that our Lord did pray for him: but it was not so much for his honour, that he should stand in need of such a prayer, beyond all others.' Lightfoot. To Peter belonged shame; the honour was the Lord's.—All need the same intercession of Christ, which is the believer's only security against final apostacy: and who dares to say, that he needs it less than Peter did?—'It is through the prayers of Christ, that the elect do never utterly fall away from the faith. ... He shows that faith differeth much from a vain security, in setting before us the grievous example of Peter.' Beza.

V. 35—38. To prepare the disciples for approaching trials, our Lord reminded them of their past experience. He had sent them to preach the gospel, without allowing them to make any provision for the journey: yet they had met with persons, in every place, ready to entertain and supply them. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, Matt. 10:9,10.) They must now, however, expect to meet with a different reception, and prepare to encounter hardship, opposition, and persecution: insomuch, that it would behoove them to take with them such provision as they had; and swords for self-defence would appear more necessary than even their garments. For all the prophecies, concerning the sufferings of the Messiah, were about to be accomplished in him, and to come to a speedy conclusion in his being crucified as a malefactor: and as they would then be "hated for his sake," and would shortly be sent forth to preach him, the Lord and Saviour of the world; they must count their cost, and prepare to be despised, persecuted, and put to death. The apostles, on hearing this, having two swords, (which were then frequently worn by travellers to defend them against the robbers,) showed them to their Lord, by way of expressing their readiness to use them, and of asking permission to go and procure more. But as he said, "It is enough;" (though two swords could not be enough to arm eleven persons;) and as he showed strong disapprobation of Peter's conduct in using the sword; we are sure, that he did not intend to be understood literally but as speaking of the weapons of their spiritual warfare.—'His meaning was not perfectly comprehended by them; and he did not think it necessary, at that time, to open the matter further to them.' Campbell.—'This whole speech is allegorical. My fellow-soldiers, you have hitherto lived in peace; but now a dreadful war is at hand: so that, omitting all other things, you must think only of arms. ... But when he prayed in the garden, and reproved Peter for smiting with the sword, he himself showed what those arms were.' Beza.—'You may easily guess at the reception you are like to meet with, when you come in the name and authority of one, who has suffered as a malefactor; and yet demand faith and obedience to him as an almighty Saviour.' Doddridge. (*Marg. (43) The appearance of a holy angel to our Lord, in this conflict with the powers of darkness, and when he was weighed down with the feeling of the wrath of God against our sins, was an intimation of approaching victory. The angel could not efficaciously communicate strength, even to his human soul: but he might suggest encouraging topics: (32. Note, Is. 35:3,4.) and it was doubtless a part of our Saviour's humiliation, and an instance of his condescension, that he was pleased to be thus "strengthened" by "a ministering spirit," though "all the angels of God worship him."—Drops, &c. (44) Learned men have adduced some instances of persons who have sweated blood: but it was always in the greatest excess of anguish or terror; and commonly attended by weakness of body.—'Christ, by overcoming all the horrors of death, in conjunction with the curse of God for our sins, renders death friendly and lovely to us.' Beza.

Desiring his furious adversaries to "suffer thus far," he immediately and perfectly restored the ear of Malchus. Yet neither this evidence of his power, nor his kindness to so officious an adversary, had any effect in softening them, or withdrawing them from their purpose!—Captains. (52) These are supposed to have been the leaders of the priests and Levites, who alternately kept guard at the avenues of the temple. V. 66—71. (Notes, Matt. 26:57—68. 27:1,2. Mark 14: 65.) From the narrative of the two preceding evangelists it appears, that after the council had condemned Jesus, they separated, and met again early in the morning: and the words here used, "As soon as it was day, &c." seem to refer to this latter meeting of the council. Nor is it improbable, that the high-priest should again put the same questions to our Lord, as he had done the night before: both to see, whether he would stand to what he had said; and that such members of the council as had been absent, might hear his answers.—Ask, &c. (68) That is, "If I demand a reason of your unbelief, or require you to set me at liberty, ye will not."—Art thou. (70) What Christ said of himself and his exaltation, as "the Son of man," being understood as a declaration that he was the promised Messiah, occasioned the rulers to inquire whether he was "the Son of God:" by which it appears that they expected that the Messiah would be the Son of God: for they charged him with blasphemy, because they would not allow that he was the Messiah.—It is not indeed clear, in what sense they allowed of this term, as applied to the Messiah. (Ps. 2:7.) But as our Lord used it, they regarded it as "making himself God." (John 10:33.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. When sinners have long gone on in wickedness, and done violence to the convictions of conscience under the means of grace, and still listened to temptation; Satan is often permitted to take full and final possession, and to hurry them into such crimes as "bring on them swift destruction." (Note, John 12:1—8. 13: P. O. 18—30.) This is more likely to be the doom of hypocritical preachers of the gospel, than of any other persons: nor will eminence of rank, gifts, or abilities in the least preserve them from it.—The avarice of false friends sometimes concurs with the malice of open enemies in contriving plans of persecution; and in getting over the obstacles which they meet with from the fear of man: and, however they despise or hate one another, they are very glad of each other's assistance. The faithful followers of the Lamb may, however, confidently commit their cause to "him who judgeth righteously:" and, after the example of their Lord, they should attend on the ordinances of God in due season; assured that no plots of their enemies can accomplish more than "was before determined," with a view to the glory of God, and the salvation of their souls. If then the Redeemer "greatly desired" the approach of his last most tremendous sufferings, that he might furnish an everlasting feast for our souls, "by his body broken, and his blood poured out for us;" with what patience and cheerfulness should we meet those lighter trials, through which we are to follow him to his kingdom above! We should, therefore, continually remember his love, his sufferings, and our obligations to him, both in that sacred institution which he has appointed, and by our daily meditation on his word; that we may feel the constraining influence of love to him, who died for us to purchase the blessings of the New Testament, which he sealed with his blood.—Let us then only beware of hypocrisy: and though the hand of traitors should be with us, either at his table, or at our own; we shall be free from their woe, and be able to appeal to the Lord, and confide in him with conscious integrity. (P. O. Matt. 26:1—35. Mark 14: 1—42.)

V. 24—34. How unbecoming is worldly ambition in a follower of Jesus, who "took upon him the form of a servant," and "humbled himself even to the death upon the cross!" Let us leave it to those rulers of this world who know not God, to lust after dominion, and to retain flatterers, who may compliment them as "benefactors;" whilst their mad ambition fills nations with blood and misery. It is our part to do good by stooping and labouring, and to become "benefactors," indeed, by being servants to all men for Christ's sake, and after his example. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:5,6. Gal. 5:13—15.) Nor are we allowed to aspire after any other pre-eminence in his kingdom, than what springs from deeper humility, with superior diligence and usefulness. Thus following Christ in his "temptations," we too shall obtain a kingdom, even as he has been exalted to his mediatorial throne: and though we shall not have the distinguished honour of the holy apostles; yet we shall be admitted to a "fulness of joy" and "a weight of glory," of which we at present can form no adequate conception.—But in the way to this felicity we must expect to be assaulted and sifted by Satan: if he cannot destroy us, he will endeavour to disgrace, to pollute, or to distress us: and the Lord may see good to permit him to harass us grievously, and even to baffle us in some painful conflicts, that he may the more prove, humble, and sanctify us; and show the power of his grace in making us at length more than conquerors. (Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) It is not owing to our own wisdom and strength, if we be not finally overcome; but to the intercession of our heavenly Advocate, who prays "for his people as he does not for the world:" therefore "their faith does not fail;" though it seem to be dead, it revives again; "though they fall, they are not utterly cast down," for they again look to the Lord, and he restores their souls. If we have experience of this conflict, and have been recovered, and as it were converted again, after having been foiled by temptation; we shall both be qualified and disposed to strengthen our brethren, to caution and encourage them for the combat, to address the weak and tempted with tenderness and compassion, and to "restore in the spirit of meekness such as have been overtaken in a fault." (Note, Gal. 6:1—5, v. 1.)—But nothing so certainly forebodes a fall, in a professed disciple of Christ, as self-confidence connected with disregard to warnings, and contempt of danger. We may honestly mean what we profess, when we say, "I am ready to go with thee to prison, or to death;" but it is not so easy to stand our ground in the hour of temptation: and unless we "watch and pray always," we may be drawn into those things during the course of the day, against which in the morning we were most fully and honestly resolved. (P. O. Matt. 26:26—35. Notes, Rom. 7:18—25. P. O. 14—25.)

V. 35—46. Our experience of the Lord's faithfulness and goodness in times past, should animate us to trust his providence and grace for the future: for many of us must say to his praise, that when in obedience to his word, and depending on his promises, we neglected ordinary methods of obtaining temporal provisions, we in the event have wanted nothing Yet we should not so presume on his care, as to rush needlessly into danger: and we may expect, that as our faith is strengthened it will be more sharply tried than heretofore. We should then be continually preparing and arming for the battle, that we may be "able to stand in the evil day" of sharp temptation: and we shall find, that a believing acquaintance with the word of God, that "sword of the Spirit," will be more needful for us, in our passage through the enemy's country, than even our ordinary raiment. We cannot expect to escape tribulation and ill usage, in a world which numbered the Lord of glory with the worst of malefactors, if we indeed profess his truth and obey his commandments: but if we pray fervently that we "may not enter into temptation," we shall either be preserved from the severer trials, or be enabled under them to say, "Not my will but thine be done." And surely, when we contemplate the Redeemer "in an agony, praying more earnestly," and "his sweat like great drops of blood falling down to the ground," while "he was bruised for our iniquities;" we shall pray also to be enabled "to resist unto blood, striving against sin," if we should ever be called to it. (P. O. Matt. 26:36—46. Mark 14:17—42. Notes, Heb. 12:2—8, vv. 2—4.)

V. 47—71. Our supineness frequently exposes us to rebukes and chastenings: yet on some occasions our intemperate zeal betrays us into dishonourable mistakes, even as our timidity does on others. For corrupt nature still counteracts the tendency of grace, and warps our conduct to opposite extremes: we should therefore ask, and wait for, the Lord's directions, before we act in difficult circumstances. He will, however, prevent the most fatal consequences of our errors, provided our hearts be upright: yet when we contrast his temper and conduct with our own, we shall always see much to admire, and much to be ashamed of.—Neither the displays of his power, nor those of his love, can intimidate or soften hardened unbelievers; for such men could treat the divine Saviour, as if he had been a thief or a robber, even when he was working his gracious miracles before their eyes, nay, when healing their wounds! But their hour, and that of "the power of darkness," was of short continuance; and such will always be "the triumphing of the wicked."—To whatever part of the scene before us we turn our thoughts, we shall see proofs of the Redeemer's excellency, and of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart: but especially let us contemplate him, amidst all the insults and cruelties which he meekly endured, looking with compassion

CHAPTER XXIII.

Jesus is accused before Pilate, who sends him to Herod, 1–7. He is silent before Herod, who mocks him and sends him back, 8–11. Pilate and Herod are made friends, 12. Pilate, convinced of the innocence of Jesus, is yet pressed by clamour to give him up to crucifixion, and to release Barabbas, 13–25. Jesus is led away, Simon of Cyrene bearing his cross, 26. To the women and others who bewailed him, he predicts the calamities coming on the Jews, 27–31. He is crucified between two thieves, and prays for his murderers, 32–34. The people, rulers, priests, and soldiers, and one of the thieves, scoff at him, 35–38. The other thief rebukes his companion, and confesses Christ, who promises that he shall "that day be with him in paradise," 39–43. The land is darkened, the veil of the temple rent, and Jesus, commending his spirit into the hand of his Father, expires, 44–46. The centurion confesses him; and the people with his acquaintance retire, smiting their breasts at what they had seen, 47–49. Joseph of Arimathea asks for the body, and buries it, 50–54. The women prepare spices; but rest on the sabbath, according to the commandment 55, 56.

AND [a]the whole multitude of them arose, and led him unto Pilate.

2 And [b]they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow [c]perverting the nation, [d]and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying, [e]That he himself is Christ a King.

3 And [f]Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou [g]the King of the Jews? And he answered him, and said, Thou sayest it.

4 Then said Pilate to the chief priests, and to the people, [h]I find no fault in this man.

5 And [i]they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, [k]beginning from Galilee to this place.

6 When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were [l]a Galilean.

7 And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto [m]Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time.

8 And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: [n]for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him: [o]and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him.

9 Then he questioned with him in many words: [p]but he answered him nothing.

10 And the chief priests and scribes stood [q]and vehemently accused him.

11 And [r]Herod with his men of war [s]set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate.

12 And the same day [t]Pilate and Herod were made friends together; for before they were at enmity between themselves. [Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And [u]Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests, and the rulers, and the people,

14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, [x]as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, [y]have found no fault in this man, touching those things whereof you accuse him:

15 No, nor yet Herod; for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him:

16 I will therefore [z]chastise him, and release him.

on his fallen disciple: that we too may be excited to call our own sins to remembrance, and to renew "that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of;" and to compassionate, and "restore in the spirit of meekness, such as have been overtaken in a fault; considering ourselves, lest we also should be tempted."

NOTES.—CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—5. (Notes, Matt. 27: 1,2,11—18. Mark 15:1—5. John 18:28—10.) The beginning of this chapter favours the opinion before given, (Note, 22:66—71.) that the assembling of the council in the morning, and an examination of Jesus before them, on the same things which had been inquired of during the preceding night, was intended in the verses referred to.—The rulers were determined if possible, to induce Pilate to put Jesus to death: it was therefore necessary for them to accuse him of some crime against the Roman government. Accordingly they said nothing, at first, of his confessing himself to be "the Son of God;" but spake of him in the most disdainful language, as one whom they had found "perverting the nation," not only in their religious principles, but also in respect of their subjection to the Roman authority: and, notwithstanding his unexceptionable answer a few days before, they directly accused him of forbidding the people "to pay tribute to Cæsar!" (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 22:15—22.)—This shows with what intent they had proposed to him that insidious question, and to what difficulties his answer had reduced them. They were, however, determined to draw this conclusion from his claim to be the Messiah, "the King of the Jews," though in direct contradiction to his own express decision of their question. But though Pilate heard from Jesus himself, that he was "the King of the Jews;" yet he declared that he was perfectly satisfied concerning his innocence of the charges brought against him. This rendered his accusers still more furious and eager in their prosecution; fearing a disappointment, and being enraged at the insinuation, that they were seeking the death of an innocent man. They therefore further charged him, with having "stirred up the people" to revolt, by his preaching, throughout all the land: for he had begun in Galilee, and had proceeded, with a multitude of followers, till he arrived at Jerusalem. Probably, they referred to his public entrance into the city a few days before, to which Pilate could not be a stranger; and to his teaching at the temple in contempt of their authority.—Certain impostors had indeed before this arisen in Galilee; and there, collecting followers and exciting insurrections, had given the Romans considerable trouble; for which cause the rulers probably supposed Pilate would have been the more jealous of Jesus: (Note, 13:1,2.) but that governor well understood the difference between armed forces, and our Lord's inoffensive followers; who were formidable to nothing, but the hypocrisy and ambition of the scribes, priests, and Pharisees.

V. 6—12. Pilate evidently desired to decline the necessity of deciding a cause in which his judgment, and his apparent interest, were likely to interfere with each other. When therefore he learned that Jesus had lived in the district which Herod governed; he immediately sent him and his accusers to that prince, who was then at Jerusalem, perhaps on account of the passover: and Herod was greatly rejoiced to see Jesus, perhaps desiring to satisfy himself whether he were indeed "John the Baptist risen from the dead," as he had once supposed. (Notes, 13:31—33. Matt. 14:1,2.) He had, however, long wished to see him, (having heard many reports concerning his doctrine and miracles,) in hopes of having his curiosity gratified, by beholding some effects of his power in working miracles. But our Lord saw good, not only to disappoint that expectation, but also to keep a profound silence in his presence, not returning any answer either to his multiplied questions, or to the vehement accusations of his enemies. Yet Herod, though doubtless vexed and mortified did not choose to have any hand in putting him to death, having probably been greatly terrified in his conscience on account of his murder of John the Baptist. He therefore contented himself with treating Jesus as a despicable person beneath his notice; except that he joined with his officer and guards in deriding and insulting him. In token of their contempt of his pretensions to be a king, they clothed him with some splendid garment, which had perhaps been worn by Herod; and he was sent back thus attired to Pilate, that he might dispose of him as he pleased. Probably, the Roman soldiers took the hint, from this insult of Herod and his guard, to clothe Jesus with a purple robe, and to put on him a crown of thorns.—As Pilate and Herod, the one a Roman, the other a proselyted Idumean, and both very wicked men, governed adjacent regions, we need not wonder that they were jealous of each other, and that causes of enmity arose between them. The mutual respect, however, shown on this occasion, and their agreement with each other, in treating Jesus with a scornful disregard, brought about a reconciliation.—'This Herod ... was son to Herod the great, under whom Christ was born; and uncle to Herod Agrippa, by whom James was beheaded and Peter imprisoned, who was eaten by worms; (Acts 12:2,3,23.) and great uncle to that Agrippa, who by Paul's discourse was "almost persuaded to be a Christian." (Acts 26:28.) ... Christ's arraignment before him, when he was sent back uncondemned, was a great additional proof of the falsehood of those accusations which the Jews had brought against him as a seditious person, and particularly as one who had stirred up the people in Galilee.' Doddridge. (Marg Ref.)

18 And [b]they cried out all at once, saying, [c]Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas:

19 (Who, for a certain [d]sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.)

20 Pilate therefore [e]willing to release Jesus, spake again to them.

21 But they cried, saying, [f]Crucify him, crucify him.

22 And he said unto them the third time, [g]Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him: [h]I will therefore chastise him, and let him go.

23 And they were [i]instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified: and the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed.

24 And [k]Pilate [l]gave sentence, that it should be as they required.

25 And he released unto them him that [l]for sedition and murder was cast into prison, [m]whom they had desired; [n]but he delivered Jesus to their will.

26 ¶ And as they led him away, [o]they laid hold upon one Simon, [p]a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, [q]that he might bear it after Jesus.

27 And there followed him a great company of people, [r]and of women, which also bewailed and lamented him.

28 But Jesus, turning unto them, said, [s]Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children.

29 For, behold, [t]the days are coming, in the which they shall say, [u]Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck.

30 Then shall they [x]begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us.

31 For if they do these things [y]in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? [Practical Observations.]

32 ¶ And [z]there were also two other malefactors, led with him to be put to death.

33 And [a]when they were come to the place which is called [i]Calvary, there [b]they crucified him, and the malefactors: one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

34 Then said Jesus, [c]Father, forgive them; for [d]they know not what they do. [e]And they parted his raiment, and cast lots.

35 And [f]the people stood beholding: and the rulers also with them [g]derided him, saying, He saved others; let him save himself, if he be [h]Christ, the chosen of God.

36 And the soldiers also [i]mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar, 37 And saying, If thou be the King of the Jews, save thyself.

38 And [k]a superscription also was written over him in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

(15) Pilate could not mean, that nothing which Herod had done to Jesus was "worthy of death;" but that Herod's conduct proved, he thought "nothing worthy of death" had been committed by Jesus. Herod's concurrence with Pilate in this judgment seemed of great weight, as Herod was well acquainted with the customs and religion of the Jews.—Pilate purposed therefore to chastise him, in order that he might be deterred from using again those expressions which had given umbrage; and then to release him according to the custom of the feast, which might render that measure less offensive to the Jewish rulers, as implying that he deserved punishment, but was set at liberty by an act of grace.—Whom, &c. (25) The decided preference given by the rulers to one who had actually excited sedition, as well as committed murder, was a clear demonstration of their malice against Jesus; and showed that this was indeed their real motive, and not any regard to the Roman authority. The words, "Whom they had desired," are full of energy. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Jer. 8:1—3. Acts 3:12—16.)

V. 26—31. The multitude of the Jews had indeed been instigated to demand the crucifixion of Jesus; (Notes, Matt. 21:8—11. 27:19—23.) yet there were many individuals who had a sincere regard for him. A great company of these, especially many women, followed him when led away to be crucified, expressing their sympathy and grief by doleful lamentations. But he called on them to mourn for themselves, and for their posterity, rather than for him; as he went to his sufferings most willingly, being assured of a speedy joyful event, and most glorious effects from them: whereas vengeance, beyond example terrible, would shortly come on their city and nation, as the punishment of the enormous wickedness about to be perpetrated. For the days were at hand, when those women would generally be counted most happy who never had any children; as parents would see their offspring cruelly murdered, or enslaved, or dying by famine or pestilence; nay, mothers would even be driven by extreme hunger to eat their own infants. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Matt. 24:19,20.) Then the Jews, who now clamorously demanded his crucifixion, would "begin to call on the mountains" to hide or crush them; that they might escape the lingering miseries to which that crime would expose them.—This intimated the long duration of their national calamities, and that more dreadful vengeance awaited individuals in another world; they would then begin to call on "the mountains, &c." but they would not speedily cease to do so (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Hos. 10:7,8. Rev. 6:15—17.) For if the Romans, at their instigation, and by the permission of God, inflicted so terrible a punishment on him, whose conduct had been perfectly holy, inoffensive, and excellent: what would they, as the executioners of divine vengeance, do to that nation, when they had filled up the measure of their iniquities; and when the turbulent conduct, repeated insurrections, and obstinate resistance of the Jews, had determined the Romans to destroy them without mercy? If such a fire were kindled in "a green tree," which was altogether unfit for fuel; what would be the case in respect of the "dry wood, which was every way ready for the flames. (*Marg. V. 32—38. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 27:27—44. Mark 15:21—28. John 19:13—24.—Forgive, &c. (34) This prayer seems to have been made, at the time when the soldiers were employed in nailing our Lord's hands and feet to the cross. In the extremity of his anguish and the contumelious cruelty with which he was treated, he seems to have been more concerned for the sin of his murderers, than for his own sufferings. The soldiers, who crucified him, were primarily intended: as Romans, "they knew not what they were doing;" and their guilt was far less heinous than that of the chief priests, or that of the people, who had enjoyed fuller means of instruction. (Note, John 19:8—12, v. 11.) Instead of complaints or threats, our Lord pleaded the only extenuation of the guilt of his cruel executioners, in praying for their forgiveness! In this he acted as our perfect example: yet doubtless his intercession prevailed for those whom he especially intended. Probably, the soldiers immediately concerned were afterwards converted. (Note, Matt. 27:54.) Many of the surrounding multitude also, who had demanded his crucifixion, "not knowing what they did," were doubtless saved in answer to his prayer; and in some sense, it may be applied to every one who is "justified

V. 39—43. The language of the other evangelists has led many to conclude, that both the malefactors, at first, concurred in reviling our Lord: but others think, that it cannot be inferred from their words. In itself indeed it is improbable; especially as the penitent thief neither confessed his own guilt in this particular, nor assigned any reason for so suddenly altering his opinion, when he rebuked his fellow-sufferer.—Doubtless, he who was saved had spent a very wicked life, and there is no proof that he was at all penitent, even when nailed to the cross; though his awful situation might possibly have produced many serious reflections in his mind. The most of what he had previously heard of Christ, must have been from his enemies: but being a Jew, he probably had some general knowledge of the prophecies concerning the Messiah, and he might have heard some reports concerning our Lord's doctrine and miracles. Knowing therefore on what account Jesus was condemned, and witnessing his extraordinary meekness and patience under his sufferings, and his prayer for his murderers; he seems to have been led, under the immediate teaching of the Holy Spirit, to believe that he was the promised Messiah, "the Son of God," and "the King of Israel;" and perhaps to remember and understand, that he was to be a suffering Redeemer, and be "led as a lamb to the slaughter." Under this conviction he first rebuked his fellow-sufferer for reviling Jesus, saying, "Dost not thou fear God?" As to this life, neither of them could have any thing more to fear, than what they were actually suffering: this therefore implied a realizing belief of a future state, and of the cause which his fellow-sufferer had to fear the wrath of God for his crimes in another world; so that he ought to have been employed in confessing his guilt, and in crying for mercy, and not in reviling an innocent illustrious person who suffered with him. In respect of himself, and the other malefactor, he acknowledged the punishment to be deserved both from God and man; they were indeed "receiving the due reward of their deeds;" but Jesus had "done nothing amiss." Thus he expressly declared his assurance of our Lord's innocence, as to those things of which he was accused by the Jews, and in his whole conduct; and that he was indeed "the Son of God," "the King of Israel," who would hereafter "sit on the right hand of the throne of God:" otherwise, it would have been indeed greatly "amiss" to have advanced such claims. (Marg. Ref. l—q. Notes, Job 33:27—30. Prov. 28:13.) Thus fearing God, and being conscious that he deserved his wrath and eternal condemnation; and believing Jesus to be "the Christ the Son of the living God," though now about to expire on the cross; and that he certainly would possess the promised kingdom, and have the disposal of eternal life and salvation; he humbly besought him to "remember him, when he came into his kingdom." He had nothing further to fear, or to hope, in respect of this world: he did not expect Christ to save himself or them in that sense: but he was taught by the Holy Spirit to discern something of the true nature of "the kingdom of God." (Note, John 3:3.) He knew himself to be unworthy of Christ's regard, or of the spiritual and eternal blessings which he had to bestow: yet he earnestly desired to be remembered by him, according to the riches of his mercy; (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Ps. 106:4,5. 119:132.) and he evidently "trusted in Christ" for deliverance from the wrath to come, and for eternal happiness, whatever his views were about the design of his death, or whether he expected that he would rise immediately from the dead, or not. He was humbled in true repentance; he "believed" on Jesus "in his heart unto righteousness," and "he made confession" of him "with his mouth unto salvation." (Note, Rom. 10:5—11.) He was decided in this confession of Christ as the Messiah the King of Israel, when all around were deriding and reviling him; and when even his own disciples dared not to avow themselves, and were stumbled in respect of his promised redemption, and his kingdom. He brought forth all "the fruits meet for repentance," of which his circumstances could possibly admit. He showed holy fear of God, humbly confessing his guilt, and thus glorifying him, by submitting patiently to his excruciating sufferings: he exercised faith and hope in Christ, love to his name, and zeal to his honour; and he showed his love to the soul of his fellow-sufferer, and hatred of his sin, by his faithful reproof, and seasonable expostulation with him. Here was evidently the substance, or embryo, of all Christian graces, which would have been expanded into all the actions of a holy life, had time been allowed. Perhaps he actually more honoured Christ in this short space, than many do who live a number of years to profess faith in him: and, in short, here were evidently both the title to "the inheritance of the saints in light," and the meetness for it. Our Lord therefore, without delay, and in the most solemn manner, assured him, that "on that very day he should be with him in paradise." "That day" was then spending apace, and many crucified persons used to hang far longer on the cross, than from the time when Jesus and the two malefactors were suspended, till the close of it: but our Lord predicted both his own death, and that of the penitent thief, before the setting of the sun, when the Jewish day ended; and their immediate entrance into a state of happiness.—The first Adam lost "paradise" by his sin; the second Adam regained it by his obedience unto death, or rather obtained for us a state of far superior felicity in heaven: into this felicity believers are admitted immediately after their death; and this gracious promise would be an exhilarating cordial to the heart of the dying penitent, to support him during the remainder of his agonies, which soon terminated in unspeakable joys. (Marg. Ref. u—x.) This was doubtless intended as the grand display of the Redeemer's power and grace, in the view of numberless invisible spectators; and for the instruction of mankind, in all future ages, about those things which relate to the freedom and sovereignty of his mercy, the efficacy of his atoning blood, and the omnipotence of his saving arm. Thus he triumphed over Satan upon the cross, and delivered the prey from the very jaws of that devouring lion, even in the crisis of his deepest humiliation. (Notes, Col. 2:13—15, v. 15. Heb. 2:14,15.)—Thus he communicated life, when he was in the very agonies of death; and he dispensed pardons and disposed of kingdoms, as from a glorious throne, even while hanging on the tree, as a slave and a malefactor! But it is a single instance in Scripture, an act of grace, well suited to honour the extraordinary occasion which once occurred, but never can again occur. It should indeed teach us to despair of none, and that none ought to despair of themselves: yet, lest it should be abused, it was contrasted by the awful case of the other thief, who died hardened in unbelief, with a crucified Saviour before his eyes, as a warning to presuming sinners, that in general men die as they live. The case of the penitent thief was extraordinary in all its circumstances: yet Jesus is still "able to save to the uttermost all those" who call upon him, even in their latest extremity. But such a single instance can give no encouragement to those who sin on, under the means of grace, and against the convictions of their own consciences, from presumptuous expectation of a death-bed repentance: and, if possible, it is still more absurd, for men to adduce this instance, in proof of their licentious views of salvation by faith alone, to the disparagement of holiness, and of good works as the necessary fruits of saving faith; when this man's faith was connected with real sanctification, and productive of good works, as far as the case could possibly admit of them.—'This thief improved his time at last, in that extraordinary manner as perhaps no man ever did before, or will hereafter. He then believed Christ to be the Saviour of the world, when one of his disciples had betrayed him, another had denied him, and all of them had forsook him; to be the Son of God, the Lord of life, when he was hanging on the cross, suffering the pangs of death, and seemingly deserted by his Father: he proclaims him the Lord of paradise, when all the Jews condemned him, and the Gentiles crucified him as an imposter and a malefactor. He feared God, acknowledged the justice of his punishment, and did with patience submit to it: he condemned himself, and justified the holy Jesus, declaring that "he had done nothing amiss." He was solicitous, not for the preservation of his body, but the salvation of his soul; not only for his own, but the salvation of his brother thief, whom he so charitably reprehends, so earnestly requests not to proceed in his blasphemous language, so lovingly inviteth to the fear of God. So that the glory which he did to Christ, by his faith and piety upon the cross, seems such as the whole series of a pious life in other men can hardly parallel.' Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Envy, malice, cruelty, and calumny are combined in the character of "the seed of the serpent," who hate and persecute "the Seed of the woman:" and they seldom are backward to charge their own crimes on those who are most evidently innocent of them. No prudence or harmlessness, in word or deed, can secure a man from their enmity and slander: yet an unexceptionable conduct may drive them into such egregious absurdities and palpable falsehoods, as serve to expose their own malignity.—When wicked men are determined to accomplish their iniquitous and impious purposes, every check renders them more impetuous; and every intimation, that they are acting wrong, is considered as an intolerable affront. The Lord, however, conducts all his great designs to a glorious event, by means of those who are following the evil devices of their own hearts; in like manner, as all parties concurred in proving the immaculate innocency of Jesus, the atoning Sacrifice for our sins. (Note, Matt. 27:24,25.)—Even very wicked men have some reserves in iniquity. There are lengths to which they are reluctant to proceed, especially without what appears to them an adequate advantage: yet, while they are restrained by inward terror from some crimes, they are kept from such actions as they cannot but approve, by fear of their fellow-creatures, and even of their inferiors! But profligate professors of true religion are commonly more hardened than open idolaters; and they are entitled to less regard from us Herod desired to see Jesus, and to witness his miracles, from worthless motives: but our Lord would take no notice of a man who had committed most enormous wickedness, in opposition to the convictions of his own conscience. How careful then should every one be, not to provoke God to give him up to final infatuation and insensibility! He, who had reverenced John the Baptist, knowing him to be a holy man, and yet at length had beheaded him; (Note, Mark 6:14—29.) was left to treat the divine Saviour with the utmost contempt, and to join with his brutal soldiers in deriding and insulting him to whom John came to bear witness!—We may also observe, that as the enmities of wicked men are often excited about the veriest trifles; so their friendships are sometimes grounded on the basest combinations in wickedness, or cemented by them; or they spring from coincidence in vicious dispositions and pursuits. Frequently they agree in little, except in enmity against God, and contempt of Christ and his cause: death therefore will soon terminate their amity; and perfect hatred, in every sense, will be their final temper and portion. (P. O. Matt. 27:1—25. Mark 15:1—26.)

V. 13—31. It is not expedient here again particularly to dwell on that display of man's depravity, and of the justice and mercy of God; the meekness, patience, fortitude, and love of the divine Saviour; the evil of sin, the misery of unbelievers, the felicity of true disciples, which the cross of Christ continually suggests to us. Let us however remark, that no man will, in all circumstances, be constant to the dictates of his judgment and conscience, who is not actuated by the fear of God and faith in his word: that they, who from carnal motives are prevailed on to sanction iniquity by their authority and influence, will by no means be held guiltless: that wicked men who reject Christ for the sake of their destructive lusts, will have what they desired, and have none to blame but themselves for their perverse choice: that many are transiently affected by the recital of the sufferings of Christ, who have no true faith in him or love to him: that sinners have cause to weep incessantly for the calamities which are coming upon them from the wrath of an offended God; and that it is unspeakably more desirable to remain childless, than to bring up children to be heirs of wrath and misery. How should we then use every means, and especially beseech the Lord continually, for our offspring, that, whatever be their lot in this life, they may be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting!'—At the approach of the miseries, reserved for the unbelieving and disobedient, the stoutest despisers will "begin to call on the mountains to fall on them," and hide them from the wrath of their offended Judge: yet this refuge will be denied to those who now refuse to flee for refuge to the gracious Saviour: and even his sufferings most energetically preach terror to obstinate transgressors; for if "these things were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?"

CHAPTER XXIV.

Two angels inform the women at the sepulchre, that Jesus is risen, 1–7. They report it to the others, but are not believed, 8–11. Peter goes to the sepulchre, 12. Jesus appears, as a stranger, to two disciples when going to Emmaus; converses with them, explains the Scriptures, and then discovers himself, but disappears, 13–33. They return, and report it to the eleven, who inform them that Jesus had appeared to Simon, 33–35. He joins the company; shows them his hands and his side, and eats with them, 36–43. He reminds them of his words concerning his suffering and resurrection, "opens their understandings," interprets the Scriptures, and commissions them to preach his gospel to the nations, beginning at Jerusalem, 44–48. He promises the Holy Spirit, leads them forth to Bethany, blesses them, and ascends into heaven, 49–51. They worship him with joy, and praise God at the temple continually, 52, 53.

NOW [a]upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, [b]they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them.

2 And [c]they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre.

3 And [d]they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus.

4 And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, [e]two men stood by them in shining garments:

5 And as [f]they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye [g]the living among the dead?

6 He is not here, but is risen: [h]remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee,

7 Saying, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again.

8 And [i]they remembered his words,

9 And [j]returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest.

10 It was [k]Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the apostles.

11 And their words seemed to them as [l]idle tales, and they believed them not.

12 Then [m]arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre; and, stooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves, and departed, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.

compassionate prayer and plea for his cruel and insulting murderers! May that prayer be heard for our souls! for we also, when living in sin, concurred with those who crucified him, though we "knew not what we did." But let every reader fear "crucifying him afresh," now he knows better, by continuing in sin and neglecting his salvation.—We should also meditate on this subject frequently; that we may learn to "forgive our enemies, to bless those who curse us, and to pray for them who despitefully use us and persecute us;" that we may be induced to persist in doing good, amidst all the obloquy, outrage, and cruelty, to which we can be exposed; and that we may be shamed out of our resentments and aversions, which are generally excited by very trivial provocations. (P. O. Matt. 5:33—48.)—While the Lord refuses the presumptuous demands of proud scribes and Pharisees, and leaves insulting scorners to be hardened in their prejudices, for the honour of his wisdom and justice; he shows that this conduct does not arise from want either of power or love, by snatching others as "brands from the burning," to "the praise of the glory of his grace." When he pleases, he can at once enlighten the darkest mind, and soften the hardest, humble the proudest, and cleanse the most polluted heart; and thus plant holy fear, repentance, faith, love, and every heavenly affection, in that breast which before was occupied by the vilest abominations! But, if he saves from wrath, he also saves from sin: and the change of nature is the evidence of the happy change which has taken place in the state of pardoned sinners. Such monuments of mercy will then become reprovers or counsellors to their former companions in iniquity; they will justify God in their own sharpest sufferings, and glorify him by ingenuous confessions of their guilt; they will fear and deprecate his wrath, and attain to honourable thoughts of Christ and his salvation; they will confess him before men, even before those who despise and revile him; they will humbly rely on him for deliverance "from the wrath to come," and for the blessings of his kingdom; and they will recommend, honour, and obey him, as far as they have opportunity. Beyond doubt, therefore, Jesus will take them under his protection, and make them partakers of his salvation; he will support them in the agonies of death, and immediately receive them to his glory: and should their passage thither be effected, even by a torturing and ignominious execution, for crimes previously committed; that very circumstance shall not prevent the comfort of their dying moments, or impede their joyful "entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." God forbid that we should attempt to darken the lustre of such displays of the Redeemer's sovereign grace, out of fear lest men should pervert them, and be emboldened to continue in sin. Instances, in some respects similar, occur in every age; but such evident changes are very rare. The most of those who live strangers to serious religion, die, at best, very ambiguously, and give but feeble hopes to discerning ministers and Christians; while numbers, like the hardened thief, depart, either despising the Saviour, or despairing of mercy: and the awful instances of this kind, which we sometimes hear of, would effectually prevent the fatal delusion of sinning on in hopes of a death-bed repentance, did not "the god of this world blind" and infatuate the minds of unbelievers. (P. O. 2 Chr. 33:15—25.)

V. 44—56. Let us come unto Jesus without delay, and "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" approaching the throne of grace, through the rended veil, through his atoning blood and prevailing intercession; that when we die, we may confidently commend our departing souls into his hands, as he did his spirit into the hand of his Father;

(Note, Acts 7:54—60, v. 60.) and by his light pass through that scene, which to unbelievers is encompassed with inexpressible darkness and horror. Let us not content ourselves with superficially viewing the transactions before us; with acknowledging Jesus to have been "a righteous man," or with some outward expressions of sorrow and remorse: but let us seek to glorify God by our repentance and conversion by protesting against the counsel and deed of those who crucified the Saviour; by a sober, righteous, and godly life; and by filling up our stations in the community, and employing all our talents in the service of him who died for us and rose again. Finally, in whatever business we engage, or however our hearts may be affected; nay, whatever be the claim of the most revered and beloved relatives and friends, living or deceased; unless it clearly amount to an act of necessity, piety, or mercy, we should never omit to prepare for the day of sacred rest, and keep it holy, according to the commandment of our God and Saviour. (Note, Is. 58:13,14.)

V. 10—12. St. Luke gives no intimation that these women saw Jesus himself, in the way to the city; as the women mentioned by St. Matthew did. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 28:9,10.) This confirms the supposition, that the women did not go to the sepulchre all in one company; that they returned at several times, and by different ways; and that some of them were at the sepulchre more than once.—The apostles, however, disregarded in a great measure their report, and deemed it to be the effect of terror, or a warm imagination, and not a reality: for they had no expectation of such an event as their Lord's resurrection. Yet Peter, who is supposed to have been with John at the sepulchre before this, (Note, John 20:1—10.) hearing that the women had seen angels, who declared that Jesus was alive, went again to the sepulchre; probably expecting to see the angels, and perhaps with some feeble hope of seeing Jesus also: but on examination he found only the linen clothes laid in the tomb, and nothing else; so that he departed thence, "wondering in himself" at these events and reports, of which he could not understand the meaning, nor how they would end; yet no speaking to others concerning them.

17 And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these, that ye have one to another, as ye walk, [r]and are sad?

18 And the one of them, whose name was [s]Cleopas, answering said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days?

to Luke.)—Emmaus was a village nearly eight miles distant from Jerusalem. (Tables.)—These two disciples were conversing earnestly, as they walked, concerning the crucifixion of Jesus, and the reports which they had heard of his resurrection; and probably consulting together what to expect, or to do, in such perplexing circumstances, and reasoning or disputing on the subject. While thus employed, Jesus himself joined them, as if he had been a stranger travelling the same road: purposely assuming a different form than usual; and supernaturally influencing their sight, that they might not know him. (Note, Mark 16:12,13.)—Having listened a while to their earnest discourse, he at length inquired into the subject, which engrossed their minds and rendered them so sorrowful. This induced Cleopas to ask whether he were so entirely a stranger at Jerusalem, that he never had heard of those extraordinary events which had just occurred, and had attracted the attention of all ranks and orders of men in the city, though in different ways? On his further inquiry, they proceeded to inform him of the things which had taken place in respect of Jesus of Nazareth, who was at least a prophet, whose miracles and powerful doctrine abundantly proved that he was "great in the sight of God," as well as in the judgment of all the people. Yet at length the chief priests and rulers had apprehended him, and delivered him to the Roman governor, to be condemned to death, and had actually crucified him. But as for them, they had confidently believed him to be the promised Messiah, who had so long been predicted, and was then expected, to redeem Israel from bondage, and to rule over them in great prosperity: and therefore these events, so contrary to their expectations, had exceedingly distressed and perplexed them; seeing they could not understand how his crucifixion could consist with his "redeeming his people." Indeed he had spoken some things about rising on the third day, which day was arrived: and some women of their company had exceedingly surprised them; for, having gone early to visit the sepulchre, they could not find his body; and they had also declared that they had seen a vision of angels, who assured them that he was alive: and some men of their company had also gone to the sepulchre, and found that the body was gone; but they had not seen him as risen from the dead.—This account seems to imply, that these disciples came away, before the women "who had seen Jesus" returned to the apostles: though some think that the contrary is intimated in the expression, "Him they saw not;" which may signify that the women reported that they had seen him; but that the disciples thought it was only the appearance of an angel in his form. (Acts 12:15.)—'But why would not Christ be as yet known by them? That they might more unreservedly express their sentiments; and that they might not rest on the bare authority of a Teacher; but on the arguments which he was about to produce.' Beza.

V. 25—31. When the two disciples had stated their subject, and their perplexities to the supposed stranger; he addressed them as one filled with astonishment at their ignorance and dulness. They appeared perfectly devoid of understanding, and incapable of forming a proper judgment in this great concern. This arose from their prejudices, and their backwardness to believe all those things which the ancient prophets had spoken concerning the Messiah, and thus made them shrink back from the subject of his crucifixion, and manifest a great unwillingness impartially to consider it. But was it not plain from the writings of the prophets, that "the Christ," the promised Messiah and Redeemer of Israel "must needs" pass through those very sufferings which Jesus had endured, before he entered into his glory? The purposes of God, the predictions of his word, the honour of his name, and the nature of his salvation, concurred in rendering this absolutely necessary. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Matt. 16:21—23. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) To satisfy them of this, and to show them that there was nothing in those events which so much disconcerted them, that ought either to perplex or distress them; he began with the types and prophecies of the books of Moses, and so proceeded regularly through the several parts of the Old Testament, adducing and expounding those prophecies which related to himself. 'What a sermon this must have been; where all the prophecies relative to the incarnation, birth, teaching, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the blessed Jesus were all adduced, illustrated, and applied to himself, by an appeal to the well-known facts which had taken place during his life! We are almost irresistibly impelled to exclaim, What a pity this discourse had not been preserved!' Dr. Ad. Clarke. As they thus conversed together, they arrived at Emmaus; and he offered to go further, in order to excite their more earnest invitations: accordingly they "constrained," or importunately pressed him, to spend the night with them, (as the evening now approached,) that they might have further conversation with him on those interesting subjects; to which he consented. But when they sat down to meat, he, though a supposed stranger, acted as head of the family; so that he "took bread, and blessed," and breaking gave it to them, as his custom had been at their ordinary meals: and, the supernatural restraint being at the same time taken from their eyes, they immediately perceived who their instructive Companion was: yet as soon as they were fully satisfied in this matter, he was pleased to render himself invisible, and to withdraw from them; but in what manner it does not become us to inquire.—Ought not, &c. V. 32—35. When the two disciples had considered the circumstances of this most extraordinary event, they peculiarly recollected the effects which the conversation of their Lord had produced on them: for their affections had been so enlivened, that their hearts seemed to glow in their breasts with hope, joy, love, gratitude, and admiration, while he opened to them the Scriptures, and showed the accomplishment of them in his sufferings, death, and resurrection. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Ps. 39:1—4. Jer. 20:7—9.) Being, therefore, earnestly desirous of communicating the glad tidings to their brethren, they set off immediately and returned to Jerusalem; where they found the apostles assembled together with other disciples; many of whom, in a mixture of astonishment and exultation, informed them, that "the Lord was risen indeed, and had appeared to Simon!" thus assuring him that he had forgiven his late denial of him. Then the two disciples related how he had appeared to them in their journey, and discovered himself to them whilst he was breaking bread. Yet after all this we find that some of the company did not fully believe them, so backward were they to credit this unexpected event! (Marg. Ref. l—o.)

V. 36—43. (Note, John 20:19—23.) While the disciples were discoursing on these subjects, Jesus himself, in a miraculous manner, entered the room, and appeared in the midst of them; assuring them, by his salutation of "peace," or of his entire reconciliation to them, though they had so lately forsaken him; and promising them spiritual peace and every blessing. Yet, after all the preparation which had been made, they were greatly alarmed at his presence, as if they had seen a spirit, or an apparition resembling him. He therefore expostulated with them on their unreasonable incredulity; inquiring why they thus troubled themselves, and yielded to the intrusion of so many perplexing thoughts and reasonings: seeing every circumstance so exactly accorded to his former declarations, and was so well suited to inspire them with joy and confidence. To remove all their doubts, he showed them the wounds in his hands and feet; and allowed them to touch him, that they might be sure it was not an apparition, but his body really risen from the dead. (Marg. Ref. p—a.)—Yet they had been sunk so low in despondency by his crucifixion; that the fact, however evident, seemed to be too wonderful and joyful to be true; and they still feared lest it should prove an illusion. (Gen. 45:26—28.) To obviate this still more, Jesus was pleased also to eat before them, "a piece of a broiled fish, and an honey-comb;" which some think was a kind of cake, or bread in use among them. Eating might consist with, though it were not needful to, that kind of life to which he was risen.—It is evident from the appeal of our Lord to the senses of the apostles, that no greater certainty can in this world be had of any thing, than the testimony of our eyes, ears, and other senses: and that it is unreasonable, in the highest degree imaginable, to require men to believe in direct opposition to them.—It is likewise manifest from our Lord's words, that disembodied spirits, even the spirits of deceased men, do exist; whether they ever become visible, or not.

V. 44—49. Having thus at length satisfied the minds of the disciples, our Lord proceeded to show the consistency of these events with his former discourses, as well as with the predictions of the Messiah contained in the several parts of the Scripture: (Marg. Ref. a—f. Note, 13—24.) and as their remaining prejudices alone caused their difficulties, and closed their minds to truths so fully proved and illustrated; he powerfully removed the obstruction, and "opened their understanding," as well as explained the Scriptures to them.—'It is one thing to open ... the Scriptures themselves; and another to open their understandings to perceive them. Christ did the latter, probably by giving them now the first-fruits of the Spirit of prophecy, which fell more plentifully on them at the day of Pentecost.' Whitby. (Marg, Ref. g. Notes, Ps. 119:18. Acts 16:13—15. Rev. 2:17.)—Thus at length Jesus convinced them, that nothing had occurred, but what was written by the ancient prophets, and what was necessary for the honour of God in the salvation of sinners. In both respects it was requisite that the Messiah "should suffer, and rise again on the third day," as he had done; in order that he might live for ever to complete the redemption of his people. (Marg. Ref. h.) It was therefore now his purpose, as well as agreeable to the tenor of the Scriptures, that "repentance and remission of sins, should be preached in his name" to men of every nation; that all should be instructed in the nature and necessity of repentance, in order to the forgiveness of their sins; and be taught that these blessings were to be sought by faith in his name, as obtained for sinful men by his atoning sufferings, as the fruit of his intercession, and the effect of his grace. But though all nations were thus to be called upon "to repent and be converted, that their sins might be blotted out;" yet the inhabitants of Jerusalem must first be invited to partake of this spiritual redemption; instead of being excluded, on account of their ingratitude and cruelty to him! 'Making the first

The apostles especially were chosen to be his witnesses, as to the truth and reality of his resurrection, and the doctrine of salvation connected with it. Yet they were not immediately to enter upon their ministry, and adduce their testimony: for he would assuredly, after his ascension into heaven, send them the blessing of the Holy Spirit, which the Father had promised to him as a Mediator, and to his church through him; that, by his powerful assistance, and by his energy on the minds of their hearers, they might both be enabled for their arduous service, and rendered successful in it. In the mean time they were directed to remain at Jerusalem, at a distance from their home and families, among persons with whom they had little acquaintance, and where they apparently had no employment. This, however, they must do, till their commission was ratified, and a marvellous power conferred upon them from on high. (*Marg. Witnesses. (48) 'Christ's resurrection being a matter of fact must be proved by the testimony of eye-witnesses, who, if they be honest men, and such as suffer the greatest prejudices in fortunes, reputation, and life, for this testimony, we have the greater reason to believe it: for their honesty must render them unwilling to testify a falsehood; their interest and prudence would not suffer them, without any necessity laid upon them, to testify a lie; much more to testify the grossest falsehood, to their utmost damage, and without any prospect of advantage. But, further, if they confirm this testimony by all kinds of signs, miracles, and wondrous powers, exercised by themselves, and others who embraced their testimony; if this was done in all places, on all kinds of persons, for a whole age, or ages, this renders it impossible that they should attest a lie: and therefore Christ bids them stay at Jerusalem, till they were empowered by virtue from on high, to confirm this testimony. Acts 1:8.' Whitby. (Notes, John 20:24—29, *conclusion. V. 50—53. At the end of forty days after our Lord's resurrection, during which time he had in different places appeared to his disciples, and given them copious instructions for their work; (Notes, Matt. 28:11—20. Mark 16:12—18. John 21:1—23. Acts 1:1—3. 1 Cor. 15:3—11.) he at length met them at Jerusalem, and went before them to the confines of Bethany: and while with uplifted hands he pronounced blessings upon them, he was marvellously parted from them, and ascended visibly, till a cloud intercepted their sight of him. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Mark 16:19,20. John 6:60 —65, v. 62. Acts 1:9—14.) Thus he was carried up into heaven, "leading captivity captive," and ascending his glorious throne, that from thence he might bestow all blessings, most freely and liberally, on his chosen people. (Notes, 2 Kings 2:11. Ps. 68:18. Eph. 4:7—10. 1 Pet. 3:21,22, v. 22.) When the apostles and disciples had witnessed this august and surprising scene, they prostrated themselves to worship him as "their Lord and their God:" for the adoration was paid after he was taken from them. Then they returned to Jerusalem, not mourning for their loss, but rejoicing in the exaltation of their beloved Lord, and in glad expectation of the performance of his promises. And, while they abode together at Jerusalem, waiting and praying with one accord for the Spirit of power, truth, and holiness; they continually resorted to the temple at the proper times, to join in the worship there performed; and especially in those psalms of praise and thanksgiving, which were sung under the direction of the priests and Levites. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, 1 Chr. 25:1—8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The Lord "loveth those who love him, and they who seek him early shall find him." They who humbly desire and pray to be taught his will, and be partakers of his salvation, though at present in error and perplexity, shall at length be directed into a saving acquaintance with his truth. —All our mistakes in religion spring from ignorance or forgetfulness of the word of God: and our judgments will be rectified, when we call to remembrance, and are enabled to understand, what he has revealed and promised. This forms one great use of faithful preaching, for by it men are continually reminded of the words of Christ; and especially they are led to consider those things, which relate to his sufferings, his death, resurrection, and glorification. Many errors in religion are like "seeking the living among the dead:" yet those who seek happiness from worldly vanities or in sinful pleasures, or who seek salvation from human inventions and superstitions, are most fatally thus employed. —Even where a measure of faith and grace are found, how unbelieving are men on some occasions! not only in those things which are contrary to their prejudices, but in those also that are above their experience, or expectation: these, however, attested, seem to be "idle tales, and they believe them not!" Yet a diligent spirit of inquiry will gradually lead to a more clear perception of spiritual things. (P. O. Matt. 28:1—10. Mark 16:1—11.)

V. 13—35. When Christians travel together, or are any ways employed in company with each other, they should be careful to commune of those things which relate to their gracious Lord; and to open their difficulties to each other for mutual edification. When thus engaged, they may expect that Jesus himself will be invisibly present: (Note, Mal. 3:13—18, vv. 16,17.) nay, he will sometimes speak by those with whom they are not acquainted, or from whom they have no expectations.—When we have carefully investigated the causes of our sorrow and dejections; we shall perhaps find that those events which seemed to blast all our hopes, were indeed as necessary to their accomplishment, as the crucifixion of Christ was to the redemption of his people; and that our fears and troubles arose from unbelief alone, and not from want of evidence, security, or information.—Our gracious Lord will reprove his disciples for their folly and ignorance, and their "slowness of heart to believe the Scriptures:" for the more diligently we study, and the more fully we understand them, the more evidently will it appear, that the Saviour of sinners "ought to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory." We should also keep in mind continually, that every part of Scripture testifies of Christ, in some way or other; this we shall perceive, in proportion as we spiritually understand the word of God. (Note, Rev. 19. 9,10.)—When we earnestly desire and entreat his presence with us, he will come and abide with us: and this will render our conversation, our worship, and even our meals, blessed. But our more rejoicing seasons of communion, with him and his saints, are commonly of short duration; yet it may afterwards be exhilarating to remember, how our hearts glowed with heavenly affections, "while he opened to us the Scriptures," as we were reading, hearing, or meditating on them; and how he made himself and his glorious salvation known to us, as we were "breaking bread" in his name.—We should hasten to communicate to our sorrowing brethren, those discoveries and communications which have gladdened our hearts; that we may thus mutually strengthen each other's faith, and hope, and assurance "that the Lord is risen indeed," as our experience of his power, truth, and love has abundantly proved. (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.)

V. 36—53. When we meet together in the name of the gracious Saviour, he will again and again "manifest himself unto us, as he doth not unto the world;" (Note, John 14:21 —24.) he will speak pardon and peace to our souls, and dispel our terrors and troubles: he will assure us of his love, and "open our understanding to understand the Scriptures." Then we shall see with increasing clearness, that "thus it was written," that redemption is completed, and that "repentance and remission of sins by faith in his name" should freely "be preached to all nations." Blessed be God, that ever they were preached in this nation! may we be made partakers of them, and endeavour to diffuse the blessed tidings, further and further, with all our talents and influence, and our whole heart and soul.—As they who crucified the Lord of glory, had the first offers made them of salvation through his blood, what sinners need now despair of mercy? And as thousands of the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in a few weeks converted to him, whose death they had clamorously demanded; why should the ministers of the gospel be discouraged, or cease to labour, pray, and hope for success when a short time may cause them to witness as happy change?—Pardoned rebels, where "sin hath abounded, but grace hath much more abounded," are unexceptionable witnesses to the love and power of our risen Redeemer: yet without the promise of the Father, even the blessed gift of his sanctifying Spirit, we can neither preach nor hear the word of God to good effect. Though we do not expect miraculous powers; we are yet encouraged to wait and pray for his more ordinary, but not less valuable influences, through our risen and ascended Advocate. Let us then plead his promise, worship his name, rejoice in his glory, and wait for his salvation; and let us continually attend on his ordinances, praise and bless him for his mercies, "set our affections on things above," and expect the Redeemer's return to complete our felicity. Amen. "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly." (P. O. Matt. 28:11—20. Mark 16:12—20. Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

ST. JOHN.

THE several particulars, which the Scripture records, concerning the inspired writer of this gospel, may be seen and compared by consulting the annexed references. (13:23—26. 19:25—27,35. 20:2—10. 21:2—7, 20—25. Matt. 4:21,22. 10:2. 20:20—23. Mark 1:19 20. 5:37. 9:2,38—40. 14:33. Luke 9:49—56. 22:8. Acts 3:1—11. 4:13—20. 8:14. Gal. 2:9. Rev. 1:1,9. 10:9—11.) He was in many things distinguished among the apostles, and was specially honoured as the bosom-friend of the divine Saviour.—To this information, subsequent histories have added but little; and that little is not entitled to our implicit credit. Some particulars, however, will be mentioned in the prefaces to the other books ascribed to him.—'The ancient tradition, and uniform testimony, both of the friends and the foes of Christianity, . . . concur in affirming, that this gospel was written by John. In all the controversies maintained with Celsus, with Porphyry, and with the emperor Julian, who strained every nerve to undermine the authority of the gospels; they never thought of controverting that they were written by those whose names they bear. So clear was this point accounted for ages, even by the most acute adversaries of the Christian name.' Campbell.—It is probable, that this apostle continued in the neighbourhood of Judea, till the time approached for the predicted destruction of Jerusalem. It is recorded, that he then went into Asia; resided some years at Ephesus; was banished to the island of Patmos by the emperor Domitian, but returned to Asia after the death of that emperor; that he lived to be nearly a hundred years of age, and then died a natural death, being the only apostle who escaped martyrdom. On some of these points there are different opinions, of no material consequence, which cannot be discussed in this place. Preface to the Revelation.

The general current of ancient writers declare that the apostle wrote this gospel, at an advanced time of life; and yet (strange to say) many learned moderns are of a different opinion! The question is perhaps of more difficulty than importance: but it appears to me, that several passages become far more interesting, by supposing that it was written long after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the martyrdom of the other apostles. This evangelist alone mentions Peter as the apostle who smote the high-priest's servant, and Malchus as the name of that servant. (Note, 18:10—14.) Now it is obvious to conclude, that he disclosed what the others had purposely concealed; because Peter was, at the time when he wrote, out of the reach of all his enemies.—He alone records the resurrection of Lazarus; a miracle so stupendous and notorious, that one can hardly conceive how the other evangelists could pass it over in silence. But the Jews had consulted to put Lazarus also to death. (Notes, 11:12:9—11.) While Lazarus lived, the memory of the miracle could not be lost in Judea; in other countries it might be published by word of mouth: but the public recording of it by the evangelists, while the Jewish priests and rulers possessed authority, might needlessly have exasperated them, and exposed Lazarus and his sisters to much hatred, and even to imminent danger. Profound silence, in the public writings of the Christians, on this subject, seems therefore to have been observed, till Jerusalem was destroyed, and Lazarus deceased; and then the whole was circumstantially related.—The other evangelists record our Lord's predictions concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the dispersion of the Jews; but this writer is entirely silent in respect of them. Now, can a more satisfactory account of this be given, than by supposing that many of the predicted events had at that time received their accomplishment? And this, with the consideration, that St. John was appointed in the Revelation to be the prophet of the New Testament, in respect of the church, and the nations as far as connected with it, even to the end of the world, may also account for the circumstance, that we find no express and particular prophecies in this gospel, as in the others.—None of the other evangelists (except by genealogies concerning our Lord's descent from Abraham and David) go farther back than the miraculous conception of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus: but this apostle begins his gospel by at once declaring who the Saviour was, antecedently to his incarnation. This is supposed to have been done in opposition to certain Heretics of those early days, some of whom denied our Lord's real Deity, and others his real humanity. The testimonies of John the Baptist also, as here recorded, are far more numerous and explicit, both in respect of the Deity, atonement, and salvation of Christ; as "the Word made Flesh;" as "full of grace and truth," "from whose fulness all receive;" as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world;" "the Son of God," "the Bridegroom of the church, &c." than we have hitherto met with. (Notes, 1:6—9,14—16.29,30—34, v. 34. 3:27—36.)—The beginning of our Lord's miracles and ministry from a short time after his baptism, till John the Baptist was imprisoned, (a space perhaps of nearly two years,) is here alone recorded. And one very wonderful miracle, with our Lord's discourse with the scribes, priests, and rulers, and the great council of the nation concerning it, in the earlier part of his ministry, is here alone transmitted to us. (Notes, 5.) Indeed scarcely any of the miracles or incidents of our Saviour's life, which the other evangelists recorded, are here repeated; and in the exceptions, it is evident that the subsequent discourses, as more fully and explicitly declaring the great doctrines of Christianity, (some of which had by the others been rather generally hinted than fully stated,) required the repetition of the narrative. (Notes, 6:)—In short, while this gospel, published long after, by the only surviving apostle, was suited to establish the authority of those which preceded; it is almost entirely an original narrative, and far more than an appendix to them, as some have very improperly called it. From about the twenty-sixth verse of the sixth chapter, to the end of the eleventh, the whole is entirely new: and even the events which preceded and made way for our Lord's crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension, though for substance the same, are enriched with such a variety of new and interesting information, as is exceedingly suited to fix the attention and impress the mind of the reader: especially that most affectionate and pathetic discourse of our Lord with his disciples, just before his crucifixion, which occupies the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters, in which repeated and most express promises of the Holy Spirit are contained; and his prayer for them, and for his church to the end of time, which closes the whole in the seventeenth chapter. To this prayer I affix no epithet; as every epithet and every exposition must fall far below such a subject.—Various circumstances respecting his crucifixion, are recorded in this gospel alone, especially his committing his afflicted mother to the care of the beloved John, when about to expire on the cross, in the most affecting manner imaginable.—Our Lord's repeatedly meeting his assembled disciples, "on the first day of the week;" with the instructive account of Thomas's absence the first time; his obstinate incredulity; our Saviour's condescension to him; and Thomas's conviction, and confession of him as "his Lord and his God," are not mentioned elsewhere. The beautiful account also of Jesus's meeting the disciples at the lake of Tiberias; his threefold rebuke of Peter, (who had thrice denied him,) by thrice questioning his love to him, and thrice requiring him to show his love, by feeding his sheep and his lambs; with the prediction of the manner in which this apostle should at length glorify God: the tacit readiness of John to follow in the same path; and the obscure intimation, that perhaps this might not be the case, is added by this evangelist, in the most artless and affecting language. (Notes, 21:15—25.)—St. John's style is always plain, simple, and unaffected, and generally perspicuous: and when it appears not so, this will commonly be found to arise from the sublimity of his subject, to which no human language is adequate, rather than from any want of exactness in selecting and arranging his words and expressions.—Learned men have noted several particulars in which the language of this gospel differs from that of the others.—The phrase, "And it came to pass," (Και εγενετο,) so common in the other gospels, never occurs in this. "The WORD," (ὁ Λογος,) and "the only begotten," (ὁ Μονογενης,) as applied to Christ; and the word, rendered "the COMFORTER," (Παρακλητος,) as a title given to the Holy Spirit, are peculiar to this gospel.—Other things of this kind are pointed out in the notes.—Where the other evangelists say, "The people." or "The multitude," St. John generally says, "the Jews;" and from this, and his frequent short explanations of Jewish customs and terms, it is supposed, that he wrote his gospel at a distance from Judea, and at a time and in a place where these subjects were little known. His style is also thought to be ruder, and to abound more with Hebraisms, than the other gospels.—The reader may enter on the perusal of this book, under the full assurance, that it is inexpressibly rich in most important instruction; and if the commentator do not set its riches before him, the fault is wholly his. But let it be here observed, that in this gospel peculiarly, the teaching of the Holy Spirit, who "glorifies Christ and receives of the things of Christ to show unto us," is indispensably needful, and must be sought by daily, fervent, and humble prayer.

CHAPTER I.

The Word who was in the beginning with God, and was God, is the Creator of all things, has life in himself, and is the Light of men, 1—5. John a witness to that true and only Light, which was unknown to the world which he made, and not received by his own, except by such as were born of God, and these were adopted as his children, 6—13. The Word became flesh, and displayed his glory, as the only begotten of the Father, 14. John testifies to his superior dignity, and fulness whence all receive; for grace and truth came by him, 15—17. He declares the invisible God to men, 18. Various testimonies of John to the Pharisees, concerning himself and Jesus, 19—28. John points him out as "the Lamb of God," and "the Son of God," who "baptizeth with the Holy Ghost," 29—34. Two of John's disciples follow Jesus, 35—39. Andrew, one of them, brings Peter to him, whom he surnames Cephas, 40—42. Philip is called, who brings Nathanael, 43—45. Jesus declares him to be "an Israelite indeed:" and he confesses Jesus as "the Son of God and the King of Israel," 46—49. Jesus promises that he shall see still greater things, 50 51.

nis gospel, with an express avowal and statement of this fundamental truth. He declares, that "In the beginning was the Word." (Marg. Ref.) Nothing could precede this, that man can know, but an immeasurable incomprehensible eternity. (Note, Gen. 1:1.) Time began when the creation was called forth into existence by the word himself: and "in the beginning, the Word was," that is, from eternity. Critics have shown that there is an important difference between "in the beginning;" and "from the beginning:" the context, however, generally fixes the meaning. "The devil was a murderer," or manslayer, "from the beginning;" but this he could not be, ere man existed. (8:44.)—Some imagine that the evangelist referred to the speculations of Plato and his disciples, in the term "the WORD," or the LOGOS, which that philosopher used: but it is not likely that he would at all countenance such speculations as those of that philosopher, which seem originally to have been borrowed from Revelation, though they were at length so distorted and darkened, as to be little better than atheism.—'The Jews were constantly taught in their synagogues, that "the Word of God" was the same as God; and that by "the Word all things were made:" which undoubtedly was the cause why St. John delivered so great a mystery in so few words, as speaking unto them, who at the first apprehension understood him. Only that which they knew not was, that this "Word was made flesh," and that this word made flesh was Jesus Christ.' Bp. Pearson. The same learned divine shows, that this way of speaking was in use, before Platonism was at all introduced among the Jews: and Jerom, in his note on Ez. 1:24, says, that the Septuagint translate the words, rendered in our version "the voice of the Almighty," the voice of the Logos, or second person in the sacred Trinity. The clause, however, is at present wanting in some copies of the Septuagint; and in others, the words του λογου, do not appear to be a translation of the original word Shaddai, but of that rendered speech.—"As the voice of a mighty one: when they went, there was the voice of speech, like the voice of an host."—'The word may probably be taken in its ordinary signification: though we may certainly conclude that this was the appearance of the second person in the sacred Trinity; both because he appears under the resemblance of a man, (26) and from what hath been said on this subject, upon Is. 6:1.' Lowth. (Notes, Is. 6:1—4. Ez. 1:15—28.)—It is indeed probable, that the apostle referred to expressions, often made use of by the ancient Jewish writers, who spoke of "the Word," in language not very dissimilar from that of the ancient fathers of the church, and other Christian divines; who, endeavouring to explain a mysterious subject, and to add further information to that which the Scripture has afforded us, have only darkened it, and laid it open to the objections of infidels. I apprehend, however, that St. John especially regarded the doctrine of the Old Testament in what he declared. We have in many places observed the clearest intimations of distinct persons called JEHOVAH, in the writings of the ancient prophets: (Notes, Is. 48:16. Zech. 2:6—13. 4:8—10. 6:14,15.) and Solomon especially speaks of Wisdom, in language very similar to that which John here uses concerning "the Word." (Notes, Prov. 8:22—31.) But the apostle "spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit," and could refer to no higher authority than his own; he expressly states the doctrine, as a divine testimony; and we should endeavour to ascertain his meaning, according to the most simple and obvious interpretation of his words; and explain occasional intimations on the same mysterious subject by his words, and not his words by other intimations.—The title of "the Word" is peculiar to this Evangelist, at least with but few exceptions; it may signify Reason, and is nearly equivalent to Wisdom, as speaking by Solomon. Probably, the title is given to Christ; because by him the perfections, will, and secret counsels of God are made known to man; especially his hidden and deep thoughts of wisdom and love in our redemption; even as a man communicates his secret purposes and counsels to others, by his word: and by him exclusively; for all prophets shine by his light, and report his testimony. 'The plainest reason, why this essentia "Sor of God" is styled "the Word," seems to be this; that as our words are the interpretation of our minds to others, so was this "Son of God" sent to reveal his Father's mind to the world.' Whithy.—It follows, "The WORD was with God." The apostle had not here mentioned Christ as "the Son of God;" and therefore he did not say "the Father," but God. The Word existed, and was with God, when no creature had been produced. (Notes, 1 John 1:1—4.)—"And the WORD was GOD." Christianity was doubtless intended to deliver the world from idolatry, that principal work of the devil: it would therefore have been the most palpable absurdity, to suppose that one of its divinely inspired teachers should use those expressions, at the opening of his gospel, which were exactly suited to draw the whole Christian church into a new species of idolatry, and which could scarcely fail to have that effect. Yet this must be the consequence of supposing the person, of whom he here spake, to have been a mere creature, however highly exalted. The article is not indeed prefixed to the word rendered "God," but the rules of grammar require that it should be omitted, to distinguish the predicate from the nominative before the verb: and the word is frequently thus used even of God the Father; so that scarcely the shadow of an objection can be drawn from that circumstance. And what can we understand by this testimony, "The Word was God," but that he was possessed of the same divine nature and perfections with the Father; participated the same glory and felicity; and was in every respect as fully entitled to the adoration of all rational creatures which should ever exist, as that God with whom he was? (Note, 5:20—23.) '"The word God," is used eleven times in this chapter, in its proper sense: nor can one instance be produced, from the whole New Testament, where, in the singular number, it is used in any other sense. Is it then reasonable to conceive, that it is here used in that improper sense in which it never is again once used throughout this gospel or the whole New Testament, rather than in that sense in which it is continually used in all other places?' Whithy. The only objection to this inference seems to be, that it is incomprehensible: but it should carefully be noted, that those who will not admit of it, avowedly on this account, are driven into hypotheses, the absurdity of which at least is perfectly comprehensible. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) Every succeeding generation of opponents hitherto has been induced to give up the system of their predecessors as indefensible, or as less specious than more modern discoveries or explanations: and many from age to age contend each for his own scheme, of getting over the difficulties here thrown in the way; yet their utmost improvements on the subject scarcely need any other answer, than to compare them with this divine testimony, to which they must be in everlasting opposition.—The inspired writer, however, was equally careful to establish the personal distinction, as the eternal Godhead, of the Word; and therefore he adds again, "The same was in the beginning with God." Having thus stated the Deity and distinct personality of "The Word," he proceeds to ascribe all the work of creation to him; as working in perfect union of will and purpose with the Father and the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Gen. 1:2,26,27. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3,4,10—12.) In this he is so explicit, as to use a repetition which at first sight may appear needless: "All things were made by him:" but the word all is sometimes used, when absolute universality is not meant; therefore he adds, "without him was not any thing made, that was made:" or, not so much as one single being, for so the original words imply. In what language can the divine power and operation of the great Creator be more emphatically described? Or what could have been said better suited to lead every one to adore "the Word," as his omnipotent Maker and Sovereign Lord? To suppose him to be a mere creature, is to suppose infinite power and perfection communicable to a creature; and the whole universe standing in the same relation to a creature, as they do to the infinite and eternal God: and to assert that "the Word" was only an instrument or subordinate agent in creation, beside the absurdity of the notion, expressly contradicts the Scripture, which says, that "JEHOVAH stretcheth forth the heavens alone, and spreadeth abroad the earth by himself:" and that "he will not give his glory to another." (Notes, Is. 42:8,9. 44:6—8,24.) Indeed it is self-evident, that "he who built all things is God," in the strictest and fullest meaning of the word. This doctrine, however, is not grounded on any single expression, but on a combination of very many; and it will therefore appear more and more incontrovertible as we proceed.

V. 4, 5. The Evangelist here further testifies, that "in the Word was LIFE;" (even as water is in a fountain or spring, or as light is in the sun;) whence it issued forth to animate all orders of living creatures, from the most minute to the most exalted. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 11:20—27, vv. 25,26. 14:4—6, v. 6. Col. 3:1—4, vv. 3,4. 1 John 1:1. 5:11,12. Rev. 21:5—8, v. 6. 22:1.) "And the Life was the Light of men:" all the powers of man's understanding and all the information, communicated to him from every quarter and by every avenue; all that can be called light, natural, intellectual, moral, or spiritual, is from "the Word," and that Fountain of life which is in him: especially he, who is the Life of the universe, is become the Light of fallen men, to show them the way to everlasting life and felicity. The light of Revelation, in the former ages of the world, had shone amidst the darkness which it had not dispelled: the Gentiles still continued in almost total darkness; (Notes, Rom. 1:18—32.) and the Jews misunderstood, perverted, or neglected the light. Even the Christian Revelation, though more complete, still shines as a light in the midst of a dark world, which generally lies in error, ignorance, and wickedness.—For "the darkness comprehended it not," or "did not apprehend it." Fully to comprehend the light which God affords us, concerning himself, his truth, and will, may be impossible to a finite creature; but the perverseness to which sin and Satan have reduced men, causes them to despise, hate, and reject the light: "they like not to retain God in their knowledge;" they will not take hold of, or retain, instruction; they do not avail themselves of the light, but close their eyes to it; so that as to numbers it shines in vain. This is the real, and in some sense the only reason, why Christ, "the Light of the world," has not by his gospel enlightened all the nations of the earth. But no external revelation can effectually profit an apostate, rebellious creature, except it be attended with an internal operation of the Holy Spirit, preparing the vitiated organ of the human intellect to receive the light, and his heart to welcome and love it: and as it seems to have been the design of infinite wisdom, in leaving the nations during so many ages without revelation, to prove by facts, what a blind guide man's boasted reason is; so it appears also to be the purpose of God to show in the same manner, that even Revelation alone will not profit fallen creatures, without the teaching of his Holy Spirit. When these two humiliating truths are undeniably proved, we have ground in Scripture to conclude that God will render the light of revelation effectual by his powerful teaching, to "fill the earth with the knowledge of his glory, even as the waters cover the sea."—The passage under consideration may be applied to all these particulars. The evangelist's language, however, is very remarkable, and has been considered as the mere effect of inattention to the common rules of grammar.—The first verb is present, "shineth;" the second is the aorist, which generally denotes the past, "comprehended," or "apprehended." But may he not have intended to state, that the light of divine truth still shone, when he wrote, in the midst of a dark world; yet, that during the ages preceding Christ, nay during his personal ministry, this light had been less apprehended and made use of in the world, than it was after his ascension, and the pouring out of the Spirit, and the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles. Before, it shone dimly among the Jews; but then it shone far more clearly both on Jews and Gentiles. (Note, Is. 60:1,2.)

V. 6—9. The coming of Christ was intended to make way for a more general diffusion of divine light among men; and this was introduced by the ministry of John the Baptist. He was "a man sent from God," wise, holy, and useful; but the evangelist spake of him in very different language from what he had used respecting "the Word, who was in the beginning, was with God, and was God, and made all things." (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, 1—3. Luke 1:11—17,76—79.) John came by the express appointment of God, "to bear witness of the Light;" to announce the coming of "the Light of the world;" to call men's attention to "the brightness of the rising" of "the Sun of righteousness;" and to testify of Jesus, that he was to be "a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be for salvation unto the ends of the earth;" in order "that all men" (or men of all ranks, characters, and descriptions) might by his testimony be brought to believe in Christ. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Is. 42:5—7. 49:5,6. Acts 26:16—23.) Nothing can more fully prove the darkness which envelopes men's minds, than the consideration, that when the Light was manifested, it was needful that a witness should be sent from God, to call men's attention to it. Light is its own witness, and renders itself, as well as other objects, conspicuous: but then this pre-supposes that men have eyes; that they are not blinded, nor wilfully closed, nor locked up in sleep: for in any of these cases, "the light may shine in darkness, and the darkness apprehend it not:" and it is for similar reasons, that it is necessary for the preachers of the gospel to proclaim the words of God, and to say, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." (Note, Eph. 5:8—14, v. 14.)—John was indeed "a burning and a shining light:" (Note, 5:31—38, v. 35.) but "he was not the Light," who came to illuminate a benighted world; having no light for himself except from Christ, or for others but by reflecting his light. He was merely a witness to "the Word," who was indeed, "that Light, which enlighteneth every man who cometh into the world." That is, he is the source of all true light, by which any man in the world ever was, is, or shall be enlightened; all that comes not from him is but darkness, at least it is not profitable light in spiritual things. (Notes, Is. 8:20. Matt. 6:22,23.) We can no more infer from this expression, that Christ gives every individual a measure of spiritual light; than from one just before, (7) that every man actually "believeth in Christ" through John's testimony: both inferences are alike contrary to Scripture and to facts.—It may further be observed, that Jesus was the true Light, not only in opposition to the false and delusive light of philosophy, and the perverted light of the traditions of the elders; but also in distinction from the typical light of the Mosaic ceremonies, and the derived light of prophets and apostles. (Note, 1 John 12:7, —11.)—'With this light he enlighteneth every man, namely who doth receive him. (12) Whitby.—'Which coming into the world, enlighteneth every man.' Doddridge. Ὁ φωτιζει παντα ανθρωπον, ερχομενον εις τον κοσμον. 3:19. 12:46. 1 Tim. 1:15.

V. 10—13. Before Christ appeared as Man on earth, "He was in the world;" both as he upheld and governed it by his providence, and as he enlightened some of its inhabitants by his word and Spirit. But though the world was made and sustained by him; yet men in general "knew him not," so as to worship, trust, and obey him. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, 18. Phil. 2:5—8. Heb. 1:1—4,10—12.) When he appeared in our nature, he came immediately to his own professed people the Jews, whose Lord, King, and Redeemer he had ever been, as a man would come to his own house or estate; whom he had chosen, brought out of Egypt, settled in Canaan, separated and preserved distinct from other nations; and whom he had favoured with his word and ordinances: so that the whole of their constitution was his appointment for their good. Yet, when he came, in the fulness of time, according to their ancient prophecies, his own family received him not, but thrust him from them with contempt and abhorrence, notwithstanding the displays which he made of his almighty power and divine perfection! (Marg. Ref. t, u.) But though the Jews in general rejected and "crucified the Lord of glory;" yet there was a remnant of them, and afterwards an immense number of the Gentiles, who welcomed him as their Redeemer and King. To all these he gave the power, privilege, or legal right, by adoption, of "becoming the children of God;" that, being adopted into his family, and made partakers of his fatherly compassion, care, and affection, they might reverence, love, trust, and obey him, with delight, as his beloved children. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Rom. 8:14—17. 2 Cor. 6:14—18, v. 18. Gal. 4:4—7, vv. 6,7.) This "receiving of Christ" was indeed equivalent to "believing in his name," that is, to a firm belief of the divine testimony concerning his personal dignity and excellency, the end of his coming into the world, his mediatorial character, and his salvation; with a cordial reception of him as a Saviour, and a reliance on him, for all the blessings which he came to bestow on lost sinners.—These "children of God" "were born" into his family, not by any natural descent from the blood of Abraham; (Note, Matt. 3:7—10.) or through the blood of the legal sacrifices; or by their own natural choice, as fallen creatures, whose will, being "the will of the flesh," is carnal and enslaved to sin. (Notes, 3:6. Rom. 7:18—21. 8:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.) Neither did it arise from the will of man respecting them; as men, who had no children, sometimes chose persons of distinguished excellency, whom they adopted as their heirs: for no man can insure the conversion of his dearest friends or relatives; no minister can choose who shall, or even conjecture beforehand who will profit by his ministry; nay, the most unlikely persons are very frequently thus distinguished: (Marg. Ref. b—e.) but they are "born of God," according to his purpose, by an immediate operation of his Holy Spirit, producing in them divine life a

Thus new creatures are formed and brought into the spiritual world, to be nourished up by the word of sound doctrine, to a complete meetness for the inheritance of the children of God in heaven. This new birth is the preparation for receiving Christ, and believing in his name, without which all men would still continue to despise and reject him.—The difference between regeneration and adoption, as noticed in these verses, deserves peculiar attention. They who are "born of God" receive Christ, and to those who receive him, he gives the "power, or privilege, of becoming the sons of God." The former is regeneration, or a change in their nature; the latter is adoption, or a change in their state: and when thus regenerated and adopted, they receive "the Spirit of adoption." V. 14. The evangelist next proceeds to show in what manner "the Word came to his own;" "He was made flesh," or, "became flesh," that is, he assumed man's entire nature, into a personal union with the Deity. "He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh," he became Man, and subjected himself to all those infirmities which sin gave rise to, as far as this could be done without being polluted by sin. He "became flesh," as he became liable to hunger, thirst, weariness, pain, suffering, and death. He "was God, and with God from the beginning:" at length he became Man, and was with man: he was "in the form of God," and he "became in fashion as a man." (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Phil. 2:5—8.) This was effected by the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus the Son of Mary, who was incomprehensibly, yet really and inseparably, one Person with the Eternal World. We cannot explain this; nor can we understand the union between the body and soul in our own persons. (Notes, Gal. 4:4—7. 1 Tim. 3:16.) "But the testimony of God is sure, making wise the simple." This testimony declares "that the Word was made flesh;" and that he "tabernacled among us," as the Shechinah, or divine glory, dwelt in the tabernacle in the wilderness; so that "the Word of God," yea, "God the Word," condescended to dwell here on earth in human nature, and visibly to display his glory for many years. For he was "full of grace and truth;" accomplishing the types, predictions, and promises of the Old Testament; exercising all kind of condescension, compassion, love, and mercy to mankind; communicating all grace to those who sought to him for it; and showing himself ever full of kindness and truth, in the blessed instructions which he continually gave to those around him, concerning the things of God and the eternal world. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, 17. 1 John 1:1—4.)—This glory was indeed veiled under his external poverty and deep humility, from the view of carnal men: (Notes, Is. 53:2,3.) but the apostles, and others who were enabled to believe in this name, beheld the glory of his power, wisdom, knowledge, holiness, truth, and grace; and they were assured that they were such as became the character and person of "the only begotten of the Father." (Note, 18.)—Some reference may here also be had to his transfiguration, of which this evangelist was an eyewitness. (Notes, Matt. 17:1—8.)

V. 15. The evangelist next shows how the things which he had stated accorded to what John the Baptist had testified respecting Jesus. When he first saw him, (for this seems to refer to the time when Jesus came to be baptized by him,) he proclaimed aloud, that this was the person whom he had announced to the people as about to appear among them. "as to the order of time, and his entrance on his work, "he came after John:" but in every other way he had been, and would be, "preferred before him." Indeed it was most reasonable that he should be thus preferred, "for he was before him.' John was the elder man, and it does not appear what sense can be made of this expression, (30) except we allow, that Jesus existed before he appeared on earth as Man, whereas John had no previous existence: for if John had only meant to declare the superiority of Jesus, he must, according to all the rules of language, have said "He is before me," not "He was before me." Besides, this would have been no more than a repetition of his foregoing assertion, when it is evidently introduced as a reason for it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 19—34. 3:27—36.)—Preferred, &c.] 'This is properly said of those who are placed in rank before others, as masters whom their attendants follow. It signifies a more honourable situation, and by consequence, superior dignity.' Beza. The parallel passages, where another word is used, confirm this interpretation. (27. Notes, Matt. 3:11,12. Luke 3:15—17.) Jesus came to John, and was baptized by him, as if he meant to become his disciple: but John gave place to him; assigned him the foremost station; in the most decided manner, owned him as his Lord; and pointed him out to his disciples, as the promised Messiah.—Before me.] 'This I said, because he indeed was before me, as being "in the beginning with God." V. 16. This, and the two following verses, are considered by many expositors, as the words of the evangelist resuming his subject from the fourteenth verse; for they consider the fifteenth merely as a parenthesis, and not as a continuation of John the Baptist's testimony. (Note, 14.) The instruction, however, is the same, and grounded on the same divine authority, whoever be the speaker. John the Baptist and John the Evangelist, the prophets and the apostles, and all believers from the beginning of the world had received all their wisdom, knowledge, strength, and grace from "the fulness of Christ:" and all to the end must receive from the same fulness. For they have nothing of their own, but sin, weakness, folly, and misery: none ever had, or can have any thing from God, but as it is communicated through his Son, the eternal Word; either in consequence of his engagements, as the Surety of the new covenant, or of his actual incarnation, and the work which he accomplished on earth. In him is the fulness of life, light, wisdom, power, grace, and truth; "all fulness dwells in him," even "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;' from which alone fallen sinners have been, are, and shall be receiving, by faith, all that renders them wise, strong, holy, useful, or happy. (3:34. Notes, Col. 1:18—20. 2:1—4,8—10.)—"And grace for grace:" this may signify, a large abundance of all spiritual blessings, most freely bestowed from the fulness of Christ, even "grace upon grace:" or, that each believer receives a measure of every kind of grace, which is treasured up in Christ for his people, answerable to all his wants, even "grace sufficient for him:" (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10, v. 9.) or, that by the grace received from Christ, they are renewed into his image, and reflect every holy excellency which appeared in his character; even as the melted wax receives line for line, and letter for letter, the exact impression from the seal which is put upon it. The words of our Lord, "To him that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundantly," seem also referred to. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 13:12.)

V. 17. The Jews trusted in Moses, glorying that they were his disciples: (Notes, 5:45—47. 9:27—34, vv. 27—29.) and indeed he was a most eminent prophet of God, the lawgiver of Israel; by whom God gave his people both the moral law, the perfect standard of holiness; and the ceremonial law, which was a shadow of the grace of the gospel. The former, however, is "the ministration of condemnation" to transgressors; and the latter had no inherent efficacy to take away the guilt or power of sin; and therefore both, as forming along with the judicial law, one complex dispensation, were intended to lead men to Christ, and could do nothing to save those who did not believe in him, though excellently fitted to the purpose for which God appointed them. 11.) These "came by Moses; but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." All the mercy shown to sinners in pardoning and justifying them: all the grace by which they are sanctified, and taught repentance, faith, and holiness; all the favour in any way vouchsafed to each individual of the race of fallen Adam from the beginning, "came by Jesus," the promised Messiah. All the faithful promises, given and performed to the church of believers, and all the ancient prophecies and types, had reference to him and were verified in him. He was the Truth of all the shadows, the Substance of all the promises, the Object of all the prophecies, the Centre of all the doctrines, the Source and Standard of truth, and the medium of communication of all the grace and blessings, which ever were made to fallen man, or conferred on him. (Notes, 5:39—45, v. 39. 14:4—6, v. 6. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10, v. 10.) As soon as Adam sinned, the divine Saviour stepped in, as it were, between him and the avenging sword of justice; and as the promised Seed, "the Seed of the woman," undertook to be the Surety of a new covenant to his people. He was and is "the end of the law for righteousness to every believer," in every age. (Notes, 16. Gen. 3:14,15. Rom. 10:1—4. Heb. 7:20—25. 8:3—6.) Through him alone sinners have access to God as a Father, acceptance with him or grace from him; and even their repentance, faith, and holiness, come from him alone.—"Grace and truth:" 'As the moral law pointed out the disease, which Christ cures: and the ceremonial law shadowed forth that which Christ indeed performed: therefore grace answers, by way of contrast, to the moral law; and truth to the ceremonial.' Beza.—(Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Ps. 85:10—13. 89:1—4.)

Grace and truth.] Ἡ χαρις και ἡ αληθεια.—"The grace and the truth," viz. which was set forth in the Old Testament from the beginning.

V. 18. As one instance in which "the Truth came by Jesus Christ;" the sacred writer assures us, that all true and useful knowledge of God was always derived to man through him. No man ever did or can see the divine essence: (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, 1 Tim. 1:17. 6:13—16, v. 16.) but all the declarations concerning him, all the discoveries of his Being, perfections, truth, and will, have been made by the Son, who was, is, and ever shall be, with the Father, as "in his bosom," the object of his entire and ineffable love and delight; knowing his infinite excellency, and sharing all his counsels and purposes, and revealing them to man, as far as it is proper that they should be known by him. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. Luke 10:21,22.)—We have frequently had occasion to observe, that from the beginning every discovery of God to man, and all the visions and displays of JEHOVAH to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Isaiah, and others, were made by the eternal Son, who afterwards became incarnate, being anticipations of that event: (Notes, Gen. 3:8. 16:10,11,13,14. 18:33. 32:26—30. 48:16. Ex. 3:2,14. Josh. 5:13—15. Is. 6:1—4. Hos. 12:3—6.) nor can those appearances of God be reconciled with this, and similar declarations, on any other principle.—According to this testimony, no man really knows any thing of God to good purpose, as to the mysteries of his nature, and the glory and harmony of his attributes, but he who receives his knowledge by faith in the Son of God.—'From Christ alone all true knowledge of God is derived.' Beza.—It is, however, doubted by many, who steadfastly maintain the doctrine of our Lord's deity and of a Trinity of persons in the Godhead, whether the title of "the Son of God," relates to any thing more than his human nature, his miraculous conception, and his mediatorial character and work; and the opinion of former orthodox divines on this subject seems to be given up by them as unscriptural. Now it is allowed, that numbers have speculated, explained, and disputed a great deal too much concerning these mysteries, of which we can know no more than is expressly revealed: and it must also be remembered, that such relative terms as Father and Son, when applied to the Deity, can only be used in a figurative sense, or one not comprehensible by us, in order to help our feeble apprehensions: and therefore they must not be made the foundation of any conclusions inconsistent with the eternity, self-existence, and co-equality of "the Word.' Yet I apprehend, that Christ is called in Scripture "the only begotten Son of God," and "the Son of the Father," in respect of his divine nature; and that he is the Son of God, by "a generation that none can declare." Various expressions, concerning the love of God in giving his Son for us, seem to refer, not to his giving him to death, when incarnate; but to his giving him to be incarnate for that purpose. "He spared not his own Son;" and this gift was so immense, that the apostle counted all other things to be as nothing in comparison of it. Indeed it does not appear why he should be called "the only begotten Son of God," merely in respect of his human nature; for the formation of Adam, and of all the angels, was a production equally immediate and divine, as that of the human nature of Christ; and "the glory as of the only Begotten of the Father," (14) evidently relates to his divine, and not to his human nature. (Notes, 3:16. 1 John 4:9—12.)—In short it seems to denote something incomprehensible, and infinitely superior to creation, and to every thing of which we have the most remote conception, constituting an equality of nature, and a relation between the eternal Father and the Son, of which that relation among men is but a feeble shadow; yet suited to help our conceptions about it. Perhaps we should never have been informed of the distinction of persons in the Godhead, but on account of the economy of the work of redemption: or, to speak more properly, that work seems to have been planned, in order to a display of the glory of God, as well in this distinction of persons, as in the harmony of his attributes. The apprehensions of the most exalted creatures, on such a subject, must be inadequate. Ours must at present be also confused and defective. The second person in the sacred Trinity may be spoken of as "the only begotten Son;" as he is appointed, in the eternal counsels, to be the Image, Representative, and Revealer of the invisible God, to man, in every age, and under every dispensation: and our conception of him, as the Son, should doubtless be restricted to his participation of the divine nature, and his representing it to man; so that "he who hath seen the Son, hath seen the Father also." (Notes, 14:7—14, vv. 7,9—11. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:5,6. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3,4.) This will appear with increasing evidence as we proceed with this gospel.

V. 19—28. The evangelist next relates a more public testimony of John the Baptist to Christ. The chief priests, scribes, and great council of the nation, who regarded themselves as entitled to superintend all concerns of religion, having heard reports concerning John, and his doctrine, baptism, and popularity; sent a deputation to him to know who he was, and whether he professed to be the promised Messiah; as he presumed to preach and collect disciples, without authority from them. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—(Notes, Matt. 21: 23—32. Luke 7:18—35.) To this, John answered in the most explicit manner, that he was not the Messiah. Being further interrogated whether he were Elias, or Elijah, whom the Jews expected to come personally from heaven before the Messiah made his appearance, he declared that he was not. He was not personally Elias, he was not Elias in the sense of those who proposed the question; though he came "in the spirit and power" of that zealous reformer and though he was "a prophet, yea more than a prophet," yet he was not Jeremiah, or any one of their old prophets risen from the dead, as they expected. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Mal. 4:4—6. Matt. 11:7—15. 16:13—16. 17:10—13. Rev. 20: 4—6.) When they further demanded who he was, that they might carry some determinate answer to the sanhedrim, by which they were sent; he referred them to a prophecy concerning him, which has been considered. (Notes, Is. 40:3—8. Matt. 3:3.) He was "the voice of a herald in the desert, calling upon men to prepare the way of JEHOVAH, who was about to come among them: (Notes, Luke 1:11—17,76—79.) and when, as "a voice," he had signified the mind of the Lord, who spake by him, he should vanish, and be no more considered. But the persons sent at this time were Pharisees, and very tenacious of their ancient customs and traditions; and they did not know that this prophecy was parallel to that of Malachi, to which they had referred: they therefore proceeded to demand of John, why he baptized his own countrymen, and made disciples, if he were neither the Messiah, nor Elias, nor an old prophet risen again. To this he replied, that he baptized the people with water, as a profession of repentance, and an outward sign of the spiritual blessings to be conferred on them by the Messiah, who had not indeed yet publicly avowed himself; but he was in the midst of them though they knew him not, and was ready to enter on his work. (Notes, Matt. 3:5,6,11,12.) Indeed this was the Person, who, as he had always declared, "was preferred before him;" being in fact so much John's superior in dignity, authority, and excellency, that he was not worthy to perform the lowest menial service for him.—(Marg. Ref. b—l. Notes, 15. Luke 3:15—17.)—That prophet. (25) 'They evidently distinguished that prophet, of whom they inquired, from Christ: the opinion, therefore, of Chrysostom, Cyril, and Theophylact, does not displease me. They declare that the Jews were under an error, ... supposing, ... not only that Elias, ... but also that "the prophet like unto Moses," being distinct from the Messiah, would come before him. This seems to be confirmed by what follows. (6:14. 7:40,41.)' Beza. (Notes, Deut. 18:15—19. Acts 3:22—26. 7:37—43.) Either "the Prophet like unto Moses," was intended, or one of the ancient prophets as arisen from the dead: for John would hardly have denied, that he was "a prophet." (Marg. Luke 1:76.) It is not, however, clear, that any particular prophet was meant: yet it is evident, that the Jews in general paid far less regard to those Scriptures which related to the prophetical and priestly office of the Messiah, than they did to those which foretold him as a glorious king: and this made way for many of the errors, and carnal expectations, which led them to reject "the Lord of glory."—Bethabara seems to have been the place where Israel passed over Jordan into Canaan: though some think it was a distinct place, and stream of waters, to the east of Jordan. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) Several manuscripts read Bethany: not the place where Martha, Mary, and Lazarus resided; but another place of the same name, as it is supposed, near Jordan.

V. 29. The preceding testimony of John is supposed to have been given at the time during which Jesus was tempted in the wilderness, and just before his return. On the next day John saw Jesus coming to him; and he immediately pointed him out to his hearers, as "the Lamb of God." (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. 22:7,8. Is. 53:4—7. Acts 8:32—35. 1 Pet. 1:17—21, v. 19. Rev. 5:5—14. 7:9—17. 12:7—12, v. 11. 13:8—10, v. 8. 19:7,8.) The paschal lamb, in the shedding and sprinkling of its blood, the roasting and eating of its flesh, and all the attendant circumstances, aptly represented the redemption of man by the death of Christ, and the salvation of penitent sinners by faith in his blood: and those lambs which were sacrificed every morning and evening, as expiations of the sins of Israel, were evident types of "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." (Notes, Ex. 12: 3—10. 29:38—41. 1 Cor. 5:6—8.) The emblem of a lamb might indeed denote the purity, gentleness, harmlessness, and patience, of the Redeemer, and his valuableness and usefulness, living and dying; but it especially marked his fitness to be a spotless sacrifice to God for the sins of his people. He is called "the Lamb of God;" as he was a sacrifice which God himself both required, provided, and accepted. As a Lamb he "taketh away sin," by being made an expiatory oblation, that justice might be satisfied, and yet the sinner pardoned. The lambs, sacrificed according to the law, were appropriated to the nation of Israel: but the atonement of Christ, being of infinite value, extends its efficacy to all nations, and to every generation of men. A lamb could not "take away sin," except by becoming a sacrifice: and why should John call Christ "the Lamb of God," in this connexion, if he did not really atone for the sins of men, by bearing the punishment due to them?—'Grotius refers this to the reformation of men's lives; whereas it plainly respects the Lamb slain as a piacular Victim, to "redeem us to God by his blood." ... To illustrate this, let it be noted, that when a sacrifice was offered for sin, he that brought it laid his hand upon the head of the victim, according to the command of God; (Lev. 1:4. 3:2. 4:4.) and by that rite transferred his sins upon the victim, who is said to take them upon him, and to carry them away. Accordingly, in the daily sacrifice of the lamb, the stationary men, saith Dr. Lightfoot, who were the representatives of the people, laid their hands on the lambs thus offered for them. ... When therefore the Baptist had said, He baptized them for the remission of sins; he here shows them by what means that remission was to be obtained.' Whitby.—'We are often told, that ... repentance and reformation are fully sufficient to restore the most abandoned sinners to the favour of a just and merciful God, and to avert the punishment due to their offences. But what does the great herald and forerunner of Christ say to this? He came professedly as a preacher of repentance. ... If then repentance alone had sufficient efficacy for the expiation of sin, surely we should have heard this from him who came on purpose to preach repentance. But what is the case? Does he tell us that repentance alone will take away the guilt of our transgressions, and justify us in the eyes of our Maker? Quite the contrary. Notwithstanding the great stress he justly lays on the indispensable necessity of repentance; yet he tells his followers at the same time, that it was to Christ only, and to his death, that they were to look for the pardon of their sins. "Behold," says he, "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." And again, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth upon him."' Bp. Porteus.—Thus the Saviour "taketh away the sin of the world," by removing every hinderance to the forgiveness of the sin, original and actual, of all men throughout the world, who rely on him by humble faith. Through his atoning sacrifice, it consists with the glory of God to pardon all persons who thus trust in him. On this ground any man may come to "the throne of grace" for all the blessings of salvation, nor does he want any other plea, than that "Christ has died, yea, rather is risen again, and ever liveth to make intercession for us." (Notes, Rom. 8:32—34. Heb. 7:23—28. 1 John 2:1,2.) In virtue of his atonement, Jesus takes away all the guilt of every believer, and "buries it as in the depth of the sea," giving him peace of conscience and hope in God; and likewise by that grace which is vouchsafed to sinners through the same sacrifice, he takes away the power, the love, and the pollution of sin; yea, in due time the very existence of it from the heart. (Notes, Mic. 7:18—20. Rom. 8:1,2.)—This general proposal and declaration of the death of Christ, as a common benefit to all, throughout the whole world, who desire to avail themselves of it, is entirely consistent with a particular purpose of God, in making "his people willing in the day of his power," who would otherwise have perished in pride, impenitence, and unbelief. Accordingly, John called on all his hearers, to "behold the Lamb of God;" to observe, consider, and depend on him to take away their sins, and to baptize them with the Holy Spirit.

V. 30—34. Jesus and John were nearly related, and the mother of Jesus had been intimately acquainted with John's parents; yet it was so ordered in Providence, that John did not personally know Jesus. They lived indeed, very distant from each other; for Jesus was brought up at Nazareth in Galilee: John in Judea, probably at or near Hebron; (Note, Luke 1:34—38, v. 36. 39—45.) yet it seems to have been by special design, that they did not become acquainted at the public feasts. Indeed, when John had borne testimony to Jesus, we do not find that they ever afterwards met together. Had they been long and closely united in friendship, as it might previously have been expected, John's testimony would have been rendered more equivocal and exceptionable: but though John knew, by immediate revelation, that his ministry and baptism were entirely subservient to Jesus the Messiah's being manifested to the people; yet he seems never to have seen him, till he applied to him for baptism; and then it is evident he was made known to him, by an immediate divine sugges

35 ¶ Again the next day after, John stood, [a]and two of his disciples:

36 And looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, [b]Behold the Lamb of God!

37 And the two disciples heard him speak; [c]and they followed Jesus.

38 Then Jesus [d]turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, [e]What seek ye? They said unto him, [f]Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master,) [g]where [h]dwellest thou.

39 He saith unto them, [i]Come and see. They came and saw where he dwelt, and [k]abode with him that day: for it was [l]about the tenth hour.

42 And he brought him to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said, [n]Thou art Simon [o]the son of Jona: thou shalt be [p]called Cephas, which is by interpretation [§]A stone.

43 ¶ The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, [q]and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me.

44 Now [r]Philip was of [s]Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter.

45 Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him, [t]of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, [u]Jesus of Nazareth, [x]the son of Joseph.

46 And Nathanael said unto him, [y]Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, [z]Come and see.

47 Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and saith of him, [a]Behold an Israelite indeed, [b]in whom is no guile!

48 Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him Before that Philip called thee, [c]when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee.

49 Nathanael answered and saith unto him, [d]Rabbi, [e]thou art the Son of God; thou art [f]the King of Israel.

tion. But when he saw the Spirit of God "descending and abiding on him," all former intimations were fully ratified to him, and he thenceforth bare open testimony to him as "the Son of God," and the promised Messiah. V. 35—42. The persons here spoken of were John's disciples, before they followed Jesus. While John stood and discoursed with them, Jesus came near them, and John immediately pointed him out to them, as "the Lamb of God." (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 29.) Accordingly, they followed Jesus, as desirous of becoming his disciples, or of being acquainted with him. To facilitate and encourage their application, Jesus turned to inquire what they sought: and, addressing him by the honourable title of Rabbi, or Teacher, they asked where he dwelt; as they wanted to come to him for instruction. He therefore invited them to accompany him; (for he seems to have had some retired lodging near the place where John preached;) and, as it was but two hours before sunset, they spent the remainder of the day in attending to his instructive conversation. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—i.) Some think that the evangelist himself was one of these two disciples, but that is uncertain: however, Andrew, Peter's brother, was one of them; who, being fully convinced that Jesus was the promised Messiah, first brought Peter acquainted with him. This was a considerable time before they were called to a constant attendance on Christ: (Note, Matt. 4:12—22.) for that took place in Galilee; and this was near Bethabara, or the passage of Jordan. It was, however, on this occasion that Jesus, previously intimating his knowledge of Simon, his family and character, surnamed him Cephas, or Peter, the one being Syriac, the other Greek, and by interpretation meaning a stone. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k—p.) This denoted the fortitude and firmness with which he would labour and suffer in the cause of Christ. (Notes, 21:15—17. Matt. 10:1—4, v. 2. 16:17,18.)

V. 43—46. When the time was arrived at which our Lord purposed to go forth into Galilee, in order to enter on his public ministry, he found Philip, and called him to a stated attendance on him. Philip was an inhabitant of Bethsaida, where Peter and Andrew at first resided, though they afterwards removed to Capernaum; and perhaps he was brought acquainted with Jesus by their means. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) Philip not long afterwards met with Nathanael, who seems to have been his intimate friend: and in a very earnest manner he informed him that they had found the promised Messiah, concerning whom Moses and the prophets had written those extraordinary things which had excited the expectation of him that generally prevailed; and that Jesus, who had hitherto lived at Nazareth, the son of Joseph, was assuredly the great Redeemer of Israel. But Nathanael, though a Galilean, had so bad an opinion of Nazareth, that he could not think it likely so great a blessing, or indeed "any good thing," could arise from that wicked place. This opinion, as to the general character of the Nazarenes, seems to have been well founded: but it was going too far, to suppose that "no good thing" could thence arise; and this prejudice was calculated to set him against Christ and his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. t—z.) Philip, however, very prudently entreated him to go with him, and judge for himself; and Nathanael, being a candid pious man, readily complied. Philip himself seems not to have known that Jesus was born at Bethlehem, or to have heard of his miraculous conception.

V. 47—51. As Nathanael approached, our Lord at once said concerning him, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile:" he is a genuine son of Israel, a servant and worshipper of JEHOVAH, an honest upright person, a man of faith and prayer, a real Israelite; while most of his neighbours have nothing but the name and outward form of Israelites. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Gen. 32:27,28. Ps. 73:1. Rom. 2:25—29. Gal. 6:15,16. Phil. 3:1—7.) "In whom there is no guile:" his profession of religion was not leavened with hypocrisy; he was the same man before God, as he appeared to be among men: and his general conduct was devoid of insincerity, dissimulation, and dishonesty. In short, he was a sound character, a really upright godly man. (Note, Ps. 32:1,2.)—This decided attestation of Jesus greatly surprised Nathanael; and, with a consistent frankness, he inquired whence he had his information, or by what means he knew him. To this Jesus replied, that he had seen him, and witnessed what passed, when he was "under the fig-tree," before Philip called him. Probably, Nathanael was then engaged in devotion, and pouring out his heart with peculiar fervency before God: perhaps he was seeking direction concerning "the Hope and Consolation of Israel," in some secret retirement, where he knew that no human eye observed him. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 2:24,25. Matt. 6:6. Acts 10:3—8, v. 4.) This declaration, however, evidenced to his mind, that our Lord knew the secrets of his heart; so that his prejudices vanished at once, and, in astonishment at what he had heard, he confessed with the utmost confidence, that Jesus was "the Son of God and King of Israel." (Marg. Ref. d—f. 3:16. 4:28—30 5:20—30. 9:35—38. 10:26—31. 11:20—27. 20:30,31. Ps. 2:4—12. Matt. 16:13—16.) Our Lord, then, in honour of his faith, assured him, that as he had believed by means of this single discovery of his glory, he should be favoured with the sight of still greater things: for "hereafter," or henceforth, he would see "the heaven opened, and angels ascending and descending on him, the Son of man;" for they would minister to him in human nature as their glorious Lord. This may refer to Jacob's ladder, which typified Christ as the medium of communication between heaven and earth; (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes, Gen. 28:12—17.) and it may be explained figuratively to signify the whole course of Christ's miracles, till his ascension into heaven, which was testified to the apostles by angels: but perhaps there may also be a reference to his future appearance, with all his holy angels, to raise the dead, and to judge the world.—Some think that Nathanael was also called Bartholomew, and was one of the apostles: and some, that he was the same as Matthias. (Acts 1:26.)

50 Jesus answered and said unto him, [g]Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? [h]thou shalt see greater things than these.

51 And he saith unto him, [i]Verily, verily, I say unto you, [k]Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, [l]and the angels of God ascending and descending upon [m]the Son of man.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. While we carefully avoid the error of those who seem to place the whole of religion in an exactly orthodox creed; and who sacrifice every Christian temper, and violate the plain precepts of Scripture, in zealously and vehemently contending for doctrinal sentiments and expressions; we should, at least, equally beware of the opposite extreme of treating the doctrines of Scripture as speculative points of comparatively little consequence. To the person of Christ, as the Foundation of all true godliness, "bear all the apostles and prophets witness;" yea, God himself has testified, "that he sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world." Let us then beware of those who degrade Him whom the Spirit of truth and holiness delights to glorify: and while we allow "the mystery to be, without controversy, great" and inexplicable, that "God was manifest in the flesh;" let us still hold it fast, yea, glory in it, as "the great mystery of godliness," with which all true piety, in the heart and life of sinful man, is inseparably connected. Let us never think of Him whose name is called "The WORD of God," as any other than "God over all, blessed for evermore;" as subsisting before all worlds "with God," and co-equal with, yet distinct from the eternal Father. Standing on these plain testimonies of Scripture, without indulging vain reasonings or requiring curious explanations; let us avoid with equal caution those who allow indeed the distinct personality, but deny or interpret away the proper Deity of "the Word;" and those who zealously assert his Deity, but seem to lose sight of his distinct personality, and thus unwarily verge to the sentiments which they seem to oppose. It is not for us to comprehend such exalted subjects, or to resolve all questions about them: but we can prove by conclusive arguments, which no infidel ever yet was, or ever will be, able to answer, that the Scripture is a divine revelation: and we can fully show these mysterious doctrines to be contained in the express language of revelation. By faith we receive this testimony, and by grace we derive nourishment from it to our souls. But it is the most unreasonable thing in the world, to reject the testimony of the infinite God, concerning his own mysterious existence; when every process of nature (as we call it) baffles our feeble powers; and when the best philosophers allow, that we can only know that things are so, but cannot comprehend the manner how, or the reason why, they are so. Indeed he who knows the worth of his soul, the evil of sin, and other things pertaining to our present fallen condition, can see no ground of hope but in the power, truth, and love of him, "who made all things, and without whom was not any thing made that was made." This will be his encouragement "to hope and not be afraid, because God is become his Salvation;" (Notes, Is. 12:1—3, v. 2.) and "the Life" is become "the Light of life" to fallen "men." Nothing can be more evident than these truths, as they are revealed in Scripture, by which the personal Word of God speaks to us; but this "Light still shineth in darkness, and the darkness apprehendeth it not." Every absurd system or detached imagination, and conjecture of soothing error, from the pit of darkness, is preferred to it, as more congenial to the pride and lusts of men: thus "they walk on still in darkness," and neither understand nor value "the Light of the world!" May we then pray without ceasing, that our eyes may be opened to behold this Light, that we may walk in it; and thus be "made wise unto eternal salvation by faith in Jesus Christ."

V. 6—13. Many have, in different ages, been "sent from God to bear witness to the truth," that "all men through them might believe;" and these have "shone as lights in the world:" but every one of them has been ready to confess, that all his light was a reflection of the beams of "the Sun of Righteousness," "the true Light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world:" and all the boasted illumination which is set up in opposition to him, will infallibly lead men down to everlasting darkness and despair. But what numbers, not only of his creatures, but even of his professed disciples, refuse to welcome the condescending Saviour of the world! Too wise to submit to his teaching, too proud of their goodness to rely on his merits, too attached to their own will to be subject to his commands, they reject him in each of his offices; or, like Gallio, they "care for none of these things:" and should he come in person again on earth, he would be despised by numbers, who could see no glory in him, and who would feel no need of him. But there are those at present also, who have other views and desires; who, conscious of their ignorance, guilt, pollution, and slavery to sin and Satan, gladly receive him as their Prophet, Priest, King, Redeemer, Physician, and Saviour; believe his word, and rely on his truth, power, and love. He is to them "the Pearl of great price;" they would "sell all to purchase him;" and, having once received him, they are ever after desirous of renewing and ratifying that important transaction. To this chosen remnant the Saviour gives the glorious privilege of becoming the children of God; and he will surely preserve them, and prepare them for the everlasting inheritance reserved for them in heaven. These happy souls are not found in one family, sect, or nation; they are not selected by the partiality of ministers or pious friends; they are not chosen because of their previous excellency; but they are "born of God." Then they begin to fear God, to mourn for sin, to believe, to hope, to pray, to perceive the preciousness of Christ, and gladly to embrace his salvation.

V. 14—18. To unbelievers, there appears in Christ "no form or comeliness, no beauty that they should desire him:" but all who truly believe, adore the infinite condescension of the eternal "Word, who became flesh to tabernacle among us." They discern some glimpses of his glory, as of "the only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth:" they value "the unsearchable riches" and inexhaustible fulness which are laid up in him: (Note, Eph. 3:8.) they see that "He is the Chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely:" worthy to be admired, adored, and loved, far beyond all the sons of earth and heaven; and that "from his fulness all have received." They therefore consider prophets, apostles, martyrs, and saints, as so many monuments erected to the Redeemer's glory, and so many encouragements to apply to him who is able to render them also wise, holy, useful, and happy; and to furnish them with every kind and degree of grace, which may enable them to "shine as lights in the world," and to live to the glory of his name. Indeed, we ought highly to value every discovery of the perfections, truth, and will of JEHOVAH: his "law is holy, just, and good," and was given for most important purposes; and we should endeavour to make the proper use of it. But we cannot from it derive pardon, righteousness, or strength: it may recommend, and then teach us to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," but it cannot supply the place of it. No mercy comes from God to sinners, but through Jesus Christ; "no man can come to the Father but by him;" no man can know God, except as the only begotten Son reveals him. Ignorance, delusion, condemnation, and unmitigated wrath, must be the portion of every man who rejects the Word and Son of God; the great Substance and Centre of all the promises; and the Life and Soul of all doctrines, ordinances, and precepts, whatsoever. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:7—11,17,18.)

V. 19—34. Let us regard the testimony of John the Baptist. He was "filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb;" he was "great in the sight of God," and one of the most excellent of mere men: yet he had nothing to say "of himself," save that he was the voice of a herald, to proclaim the Saviour's glory; being "unworthy even to loose the latchet of his shoes." He knew that Jesus was "before him," as the eternal Word; that he would for ever be "preferred before him" and all creatures; and that he alone could pardon sin, or baptize with the Holy Ghost. He thought he could not enough abase himself, or exalt his Lord: he only desired to prepare his ways, and to manifest him to Israel. Let us then not at all regard those who exalt themselves and degrade Christ: for their light is darkness, and their wisdom madness, being directly in opposition to the wisdom of God, and "the Light of the world." But let us especially behold Jesus "as the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." Sin must be taken away, or sinners must be ruined for ever: "God hath provided himself a Lamb for a burnt-offering," through whose infinitely valuable atonement, he can be "just and the justifier of the ungodly." Let sinners then behold and trust in him: let believers look to him continually for renewing pardon, peace, strength, encouragement, motives, instructions, righteousness; and a perfect example of holy meekness, patience, and love. (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) Thus guilt will be removed from the conscience, and sin will be taken away from the heart, till no more remain there. And while we look to him for pardon, let us also earnestly seek to be made like him, and to partake of his baptism by the Holy Ghost, that we may abound in all holy fruits to the glory of his name.

V. 35—51. The ministers of Christ must never desire to make disciples to themselves, but to him: they, who are inquiring after salvation, must hearken to those teachers, who direct them to "the Lamb of God," and distinguish them from all others: and they, who have known him to their comfort and profit, should endeavour to recommend him to others; that thus each believer may bring his brother, his friend, his children, or his neighbours: and so, these private exertions combining to draw men's attention to the testimony of minis-

CHAPTER II.

At a marriage in Cana, Jesus turns water into wine, 1—11. He goes to Capernaum, 12, and thence to Jerusalem, where he drives the buyers and sellers out of the temple, 13—17. He predicts his own death and resurrection, as the proof of his authority, 18—22. Many believe in him because of his miracles; but he does not commit himself to them, as "knowing what was in man," 23—25.

AND [s]the third day there was [b]a marriage in [c]Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there.

2 And [d]both Jesus was called, and [e]his disciples, to the marriage.

3 And when [f]they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, [g]They have no wine.

4 Jesus saith unto her, [h]Woman, [i]what have I to do with thee? [k]mine hour is not yet come.

5 His mother saith unto the servants, [l]Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it.

6 And there were set there six water-pots of stone, [m]after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece.

7 Jesus saith unto them, [n]Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim.

8 And he saith unto them, [o]Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bear it.

9 When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was, (but the servants which drew the water knew,) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom,

10 And saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; [p]and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: [q]but thou hast kept the good wine until now.

11 This [r]beginning of miracles [s]did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and [t]manifested forth his glory; [u]and his disciples believed on him.

ters; the light may diffuse itself more widely in families, cities, and countries. (Notes, Is. 2:2—5. 2 Thes. 3:1—5, v. 1.) —All who desire to profit by the word of God, must beware of narrow prejudices against places, or denominations of men, from which even pious Christians are by no means exempt: they should come, and examine for themselves; and then perhaps they will find good where they expected none.—But let us seek and pray to be "Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile," truly Christians, approved of Christ himself. Defects and infirmities are found in all; but hypocrisy and guile belong not to a believer's character. He does not profess one thing with his lips, and think another thing in his heart; he is not a double-minded or deceitful man: it is peculiar to him, to allow of nothing before God which he disavows before men, to pretend to nothing before men, which God knows that he does not aim to perform. He is consciously, as well as by confession, a poor sinner, who has no hope of deliverance from condemnation or pollution, but through the mercy and grace of God in Christ: and whilst he seeks free salvation, he really aims, and desires, and earnestly endeavours to lead a sober, righteous, and godly life; and is continually abased before God, because he "cannot do the things that he would." He "who seeth in secret" observes and approves this disposition, and hears the retired supplications which it dictates. He marks the humble believer, when beseeching him to teach him his truth and will; and he will evince that he graciously accepts of such petitions. Thus the believer obtains "the witness in himself," that "Jesus is the Son of God, and the King of Israel;" and he will attain continually to fuller discoveries of his glory, and larger communications from him; till he learns to "love his appearing," "in his own glory, and in the glory of the Father, with all his holy angels, when he will render unto every man according to his works."

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—5. On the third day after our Lord's interview with Nathanael, or after his return into Galilee, (1:43,51.) a marriage was solemnized at Cana, a small town in that neighbourhood, "called Cana of Galilee," to distinguish it from another, in the lot of Ephraim. (11. 4:46. 21:2. Josh. 16:8. 19:28.)—Probably, Mary was nearly related to one of the parties, for she seems to have been present as one of the family: and as Joseph is not mentioned, either on this occasion or afterwards, we may suppose that he died before our Lord entered on his public ministry.—Jesus had now collected a few disciples, and both he and they were invited to the marriage-feast: and, in order to honour God's institution, as well as to show the free and social spirit of his religion, he was pleased to accept of the invitation. (Marg. Ref. b, d.) Perhaps, they had not been previously expected, and our Lord's presence might also draw others thither to hear his conversation; so that all the wine provided for the occasion was nearly spent: and it is probable, that the persons concerned were not affluent, nor well able to bear any additional expense. Mary therefore stated the case to her Son, as under some concern about it, and with expectation of his providing a miraculous supply. Some expositors think that he had before wrought miracles in private, to supply the necessities of the family: but this is highly improbable; and the circumstances of his conception and birth, could not but lead his mother to expect extraordinary things from him, now that he had entered on his public ministry. But Jesus replied to her in a manner which showed that she was in some measure reprehensible, in supposing that her authority or influence was to be employed in directing his conduct as the Messiah. There is not indeed the least disrespect in the word, "Woman," with which he addressed her; as the greatest princesses were accosted, even by their own servants, in the same manner among the ancients; and he afterwards used it, when speaking from the cross with the most endeared affection and tenderness; (Note, 19:25—27.) yet the whole reply was an evident and intentional discouragement to her, from interposing on such occasions. In this respect, "what had he to do with her," or with any other? None must dictate to him, when or for whom he should work miracles. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. Mark 3:20,21,31—35. Luke 2:41—52. 2 Cor. 5:16.)—"My time is not yet come." The time of our Lord's open appearance as the Messiah was not yet completely arrived, and a public miracle might not have been expedient.—The occasion, on which this miracle was wrought, the miracle itself, and this answer of our Lord to Mary, seem to have been expressly intended, as a prophetical protest against the superstitions and idolatries of the church of Rome; especially against two leading branches of that system, namely, the disparaging and prohibiting of marriage, and the worship of the Virgin Mary. Even to this day there are very large multitudes who call on her, not to beseech, but to command, her Son, now that he fills the throne of glory; though in his lowest humiliation on earth, he would not allow her even to counsel him in the exercise of his sacred ministry!—Mary, however, did not give up her hope of a miraculous supply, though she saw the propriety of not urging it: she therefore ordered the servants carefully to observe and follow his directions, whatever they might be, or attended with whatever inconvenience. V. 6—11. The Jews had vessels in their houses, in which they kept water always ready for the ceremonial washings prescribed by the law; as well as for the observance of the purifications, enjoined by the traditions of the elders. It is not agreed how much each of these water-pots contained; but on the lowest computation the six must have held above a hogshead.—Our Lord was pleased to order the servants to fill these vessels with water, by which they became unexceptionable witnesses to the reality of the miracle: and, though they had doubtless a variety of other employments on this occasion, and the order might seem ill-timed and to no purpose; they obeyed without hesitation, and filled the water-pots "to the brim!" As soon as this was done, Jesus directed them to draw from them, and carry it to "the ruler of the feast;" and they obeyed without making the least objection, drawing out what they had just before put into the vessels as water, and carrying it to "the ruler of the feast," to set before the guests, as wine! (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Josh. 6:3—5. Judg. 7:1—8, 16—22. Ez. 37:1—10, vv. 4—7,9,10.)—"The ruler of the feast" seems to have been a person chosen to maintain order on such occasions, as well as to see that all the guests had what they wanted; and some think that a Levite or priest was generally chosen for that purpose.—When this person therefore had tasted this fresh supply of wine, without knowing how it was procured: he found it so excellent, that he expressed his surprise to the bridegroom, at his having acted so differently from what others used to do on such occasions: for it was customary to give them good wine, till they had drunk what was sufficient: and then that which was of a smaller and inferior quality, as most suitable to their situation: whereas he had kept the best wine till the last! The original word, which is rendered "have well drunk," is often used for men's drinking to intoxication; yet learned men have shown that it does not necessarily imply that idea, but merely a moderate exhilaration consistent with temperance. (Note, Gen. 43:34.) It may however be further observed, that the words refer to the general management of feasts, and not to any thing which took place on the occasion: where we may be sure, every circumstance was conducted with the utmost

13 ¶ And the Jews' [z]passover was at hand; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem,

14 And [c]found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting:

15 And when he had made a scourge of small cords, [b]he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep and the oxen; and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables;

16 And said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence; [c]make not [d]my Father's house an house of merchandise.

17 And his disciples remembered that it was written, [e]The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.

18 Then answered the Jews, and said unto him, [f]What sign showest thou unto us, [g]seeing that thou doest these things?

19 Jesus answered and said unto them, [h]Destroy this temple, [i]and in three days [k]I will raise it up.

20 Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?

21 But [l]he spake of the [m]temple of his body.

22 When therefore he was risen from the dead, [n]his disciples remembered that he had said this unto them; [o]and they believed the Scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

23 ¶ Now when he was in Jerusalem at the passover, in the feast-day, [p]many believed in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did.

24 But Jesus [q]did not commit himself unto them, [r]because he knew all men, regard to temperance and propriety.—The remainder of this wine would be an ample recompense to the new-married persons, for the entertainment of Jesus and his disciples.—This was the beginning of Christ's miracles, by which he "manifested his glory:" an expression never used concerning the miracles of any prophet or apostle, and which could not properly have been used; for they were only instruments, the power being of God, and for the display of his glory which belonged to him alone: but Jesus wrought by his own power, as Emmanuel, and displayed his "own glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."—This miracle, however, was not wrought publicly, or generally made known: yet it served to confirm the faith of the disciples in him, as the Son of God and the promised Messiah. V. 12. (Marg. Ref.) This preceded John's imprisonment. Our Lord on this occasion visited Capernaum, and continued a few days there, with his disciples and brethren, before he ascended to Jerusalem to keep the approaching passover; but after John was imprisoned, he went to reside at Capernaum.

V. 14—17. This was evidently a distinct transaction from that which has before been considered: (Notes, Matt. 21:12, 13. Mark 11:15—21.) for it took place on the first passover, after Jesus entered on his public ministry; which he almost began and ended, by purging the temple from the mercenary traders, whom the covetous priests and rulers encouraged to make a market-place of its courts. Considering the immense number of sacrifices used at the feast of the passover, it must have been a very large market, which was there held, and a great multitude of people must have been assembled and employed: yet Jesus, appearing as a poor man, at that time but little known, without human authority, without attendants or arms, except a scourge made of the small cords which were used in fastening the parts of the pens, or folds, or in other ways confining the cattle, drove them all before him; overturning the tables of those who exchanged foreign for current coin, and clearing the place of them; though it must be supposed that pride, avarice, resentment, and every corrupt passion, would have disposed them to resistance, if they had not been over-awed and overpowered. (Marg. Ref.)—In ordering those who sold doves, to remove them, that they might no longer render "the house of God a house of merchandise," he expressly called "God his Father;" and that in a manner which evidently implied a claim to be the promised Messiah, "the Son of God." When the disciples witnessed his courage and vehemency, his holy indignation, and disregard to opposition or reproach, in thus vindicating the courts of the temple from so gross a profanation; and compared them with the general meekness and gentleness of his character, (Note, Mark 3:1—5.) they recollected a passage in which David, speaking as a type of the Messiah, and uttering many evident predictions of him, had said, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up;" or, 'I am inwardly consumed by an earnest desire to purify thy sacred ordinances and thy holy habitation from every corruption; and can have no ease, till I have taken proper measures for that purpose:' and they readily perceived how applicable it was to the conduct of Jesus on this occasion. (Note, Ps. 69:8,9.)—The quotation is exactly in the words of the Septuagint, and as exactly translates the Hebrew.—Oxen. (14) No oxen, in the strict meaning of the word, were offered in sacrifice; but bulls, or cows only. V. 18—22. We can scarcely conceive of an action more incontestably evidential of a divine energy, or more undeniably right in itself, than the driving of the traders from the temple; yet the Jews (probably the scribes, priests, and rulers) demanded of Jesus some sign or attestation from heaven to his mission: seeing he presumed, in defiance of public authority, to act in this manner. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, Matt. 21:23—27.) In answer to this demand, he said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will rear it up again." Some think that he pointed to his body at the time; but, as his disciples did not understand him till long afterwards, this is not likely. His opponents, however, treated his assertion with derision: forty-six years had elapsed from the time that Herod the king had begun to rebuild, or repair the temple; and, though a very great number of hands had at some times been employed, it was not yet completed: and would he alone presume to rebuild it, if destroyed, in the short space of "three days?" (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, Hag. 2:6—9.)—But he spake, not of the temple which was of man's building, but "of his body," of which the temple was a type. The Jews would proceed in their enmity, till they had, as it were, demolished that temple by his crucifixion; and then on the third day he would raise it up again, and thus give the grand proof of his being "the Son of God," and the promised Messiah.—This explanation of the Evangelist contains two direct proofs of the Deity of Christ: his body was, in an especial sense, "a Temple," in which God dwelt, and in which he displayed his glory: (Notes, Col. 1:18—20. 2:8,9.) and he declared that he would raise his body from the dead by his own power; yet doubtless "God raised him from the dead." (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, 10:14—18, vv. 17,18. Acts 10: 36—43, v. 40. Heb. 13:20,21. 1 Pet. 1:3—5, v. 3. 3:17,18, v. 18.)—After his resurrection his disciples remembered and understood this remarkable prediction: and when compared with its exact accomplishment, it confirmed their faith in him as the Messiah, "the Son of God," and in the Scriptures that testified of him. His enemies also remembered these words some years after, and by misquoting them bare false witness against him. (Note, Matt. 26:57—62.)

Naos properly means the sanctuary, apart from its courts; and so Jesus meant: but the application of it by the Jews must be understood with some latitude; for a very large proportion of that which Herod caused to be done, was about the out-buildings of the sanctuary.

V. 23—25. It appears, that our Lord wrought several miracles at Jerusalem during this passover, and many per sons were thus led to believe in him, and own him as a prophet, or even as the Messiah: but they seem to have had no proper knowledge of the spiritual redemption which he came to effect, nor any due sense of their need of his salvation. (*Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. We should always endeavour to ensure the divine approbation in all our undertakings. "Marriage indeed is honourable among all men," and Jesus sanctioned and graced that institution by his first miracle, as well as by his presence: yet the believer cannot expect comfort and a blessing, unless he engage in it on such principles, and in such a manner, as may give him confidence in calling on Jesus, so to speak, to attend on it. (Note, Col. 3:16,17, v. 16.)—We ought not in any thing to affect a superstitious austerity, nor need we scruple to feast with our friends on proper occasions. yet every social interview should be so conducted, that we might confidently invite the Redeemer to join with us, if he were now on earth. He will at all times be present invisibly, to approve or condemn our conduct; and all levity, luxury, and excess, must be offensive to him. If we would have the comfort of his presence, we must entertain his disciples also; and our conversation should be such as they delight in. In this manner we may "use hospitality without grudging;" and the Lord himself will not suffer us to want. Having stated our difficulties to him, and submitted to his wisdom, in respect of the season, manner, and proportion of our supply, we shall not long be left unprovided for.—But how ready should we also be to relieve our needy brethren, and to minister to their comfort; seeing Jesus himself wrought a miracle to supply wine on a joyful occasion, for the refreshment of the company! —If we would have blessings from his power and love, we must unreservedly and promptly follow his directions; even though some of them should seem to us unnecessary or unseasonable.—What he gives in a special manner to his disciples is always the best; and his ways are not only unlike those of men, but far superior to them. (Note, Is. 55:8,9.)—The anger of God, the curse of his broken law, and our depravity and guilt, turn the bounties of Providence into occasions of deeper destruction; but his blessing and the grace of the gospel convert them all into spiritual advantages, and give them a peculiar relish. Thus Moses opened his commission to the Egyptians, by changing water into blood; but Christ began his gracious ministry, by turning water into wine.—Those whom the world feasts have their best wine first; and even while they live, every enjoyment grows more and more insipid; their mirth is soon damped; and death at length removes them to final misery and despair: (Note, Luke 16:24—26.) but they whom Christ entertains at his marriage-supper, have indeed many present comforts, which increase on them here: but their best wine is kept till last, and they shall drink it for ever "new in the kingdom of their Father." In all these things he manifests his glory; and his disciples, who believe in his name, will be excited more and more to honour and obey him.

V. 12—25. Where the presence and doctrine of Christ are not valued, they will not long be continued: but he always is present with those who copy his example, by conscientiously attending on the ordinances of God. His power is principally exerted by a secret influence upon the minds of men; and to extirpate the corruptions from our hearts, and from his visible church, (where, alas! they are found in great abundance,) constitutes the chief part of his present severity. His hand holds the scourge, not the avenging sword, during the day of his patience; nor will he ever destroy those who are willing to be cleansed. Zeal for the honour of the sanctuary and ordinances of God still engrosses his mind: his indignation is daily excited by the abominations of those who make "his Father's house an house of merchandise;" and, unless they repent, he will at length "make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath." They, who of old questioned his authority to purge his temple, and to oppose their wickedness, were at length enraged by his rebukes to put him to death; but he raised up the sacred temple of his body by his own divine power, that in it "all the fulness of the Godhead might dwell" for ever. He speedily took dreadful vengeance on the Jews for their enormous impiety; and all who despise his authority and warnings, or hate his gospel, shall perish in like manner. But his disciples will reverence his words, when they do not fully understand them; they will treasure them up in their memories, and wait till the event explains them; and thus their faith will be continually strengthened by further evidence of his truth and love.—Let us above all beware of a dead faith, or a formal profession; as carnal temporary believers are not to be trusted, for they often prove most treacherous enemies: and, however men may impose on others or on themselves, they cannot impose on their glorious heart-searching Judge. (Notes, Matt. 13:20,21. 22:11—14. 25:1—13. P. O. 1—13.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The miracles which our Lord wrought at Jerusalem, and those reported to have been wrought by him in other places, excited the attention of the rulers and Pharisees: and, though prejudiced against him, they were not at this time so inveterate as they afterwards became. Indeed, some of them were of opinion, that he was an extraordinary prophet: and Nicodemus, who was a Pharisee, a teacher and a ruler of the Jews, or a member of their grand council, was desirous of some conversation with him. But, as he was afraid of being reviled by his brethren, or otherwise subjected to censure and suspicion; he came by night privately to the house where Jesus lodged, at or near Jerusalem; and addressed him by the respectful name of Rabbi. This appears the more remarkable when we consider the obscurity of our Lord's birth and education, and the poverty of his circumstances, and contrast them with the rank and station of Nicodemus. He also declared that he and others were assured that he was a Teacher sent immediately from God; as no man could perform such powerful and beneficent miracles, without the presence, favour, and operation of almighty God: and in this conviction, he came to him, that he might learn what were the peculiar doctrines or practices which he came to inculcate. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 5:31—38. 9:27—34, vv. 30—33. 14:7—14, v. 11. Acts 10:36—43, v. 38.)

A teacher come from God. (2) Απο Θεου εληλυθας διδασκαλος. "From God thou hast come a Teacher," or "to be a Teacher." This introduction shows that Nicodemus expected some very momentous and peculiar instruction from Jesus, who had after a lapse of ages "come from God as a Teacher," and confirming his doctrine by undeniable miracles.

V. 3. The Pharisees, besides a scrupulous exactness in the ceremonies of the law, strictly observed "the traditions of the elders;" and thus sought and rested in an external purity, while the heart was full of uncleanness: but our Lord immediatelv directed the attention of Nicodemus to the source of internal purity. (Note, Matt. 23:25—28.)—It has been already observed, that the word Verily, implies a strong asseveration: and in the beginning of a sentence it is peculiar to Christ. (Note, Matt. 6:5.) St. John generally mentions the affirmation as doubled, which adds a still greater energy to it. (Marg. Ref. See on 1:52.) We are therefore previously sure, that something of peculiar importance, and very liable to be overlooked, is here intended. If it be allowed that the expression, "born again," is figurative, and therefore ought not to be strained too far in the interpretation: yet surely the figure should be regarded as peculiarly appropriate and significant. Some argue that "to be born again" means no more than to be baptized, and they quote the ancient fathers in proof of it. But will any man say, that no one can "see," or "enter into" the kingdom of God; (5) that is, no one can understand the nature of true religion, become Christ's true disciple, or inherit the happiness of heaven, without the baptism of water? This is indeed the outward sign: but surely we must look for something far more spiritual, as the thing signified, than baptism, or any thing which uniformly accompanies it, even when rightly administered.—Others understand it of reformation: but outward reformation may be mere hypocrisy; or it may be the result of worldly and selfish motives, or corrupted by pride and ostentation. Nay, a man may change one kind of sin for another, or one creed or sect for another, in various ways, and yet remain very "far from the kingdom of God:" in short, 'If regeneration here mean only reformation of life, our Lord, instead of making any new discovery, has thrown a great deal of obscurity on what was before plain and obvious, and known, not only to the Jews, but to the wiser heathens. And indeed this is the main article in dispute among many. Some think, all things in Scripture are expressed in condescension to our capacities, so that there is still to be conceived in many of them an inexpressible grandeur: whilst on the other hand, others suppose, that under the pomp and grandeur of the most hyperbolical expressions, things of a low and ordinary sense are to be understood.' Owen. Every one may see how applicable this is to all those interpretations of the new birth, which explain this most energetic expression to signify, either things exceedingly plain, or of a very inferior nature in religion.—Frequent occasions have before occurred of considering the subject; (Notes, 1:10—13. Jer. 32:39—41, v. 39. Ez. 11:17—20. 36:25—27.) but it may here be expedient to elucidate the propriety of the metaphor. When a child is born into the world, though no new matter is brought into existence, yet "a new creature" is produced; and all its capacities, senses, and limbs are new, and suited to that new life on which it has entered. Thus when the grace of God changes the sinner's heart, the person indeed is the same; but he becomes a new man, possessed of new capacities, perceptions, affections, and dispositions, and is prepared to make a new use of all his organs, senses, and faculties: he enters as "a new creature" into the spiritual world, and becomes capable of employments and satisfactions, to which he was before an utter stranger. (Notes, Eph. 2:4—10, v. 10. 2 Cor. 5:17.)—When an infant is born, it has all the parts of a grown man: but they are in a feeble state, and need nourishment, attention and time, before they grow to their proper size, and are fitted to perform their appropriate functions in a complete manner. Thus the regenerated sinner has the substance of all right principles and holy dispositions communicated to his soul; but they are in an infantile state, and must grow up gradually, and with care and spiritual nourishment, to maturity: this nourishment is provided, and "the new-born babe," in the spiritual as well as in the natural world, desires, relishes, and thrives upon it. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3.)—No man can comprehend how the infant is formed in the womb; nor can any man know how God effects the new-creating change in the sinner's heart. He works by means and instruments in both cases: and in each of them a real creation is effected by his omnipotence. The birth of the infant precedes the exercise of its senses, and is the necessary introduction to all the actions of future life: so the new birth must precede all the actions of the spiritual life: till that has taken place, the man can neither see, hear, speak, walk, or work in a spiritual manner. But as, when a living child is born, it will certainly move and act; so when the sinner is "born again," he will repent, believe, love, obey, and worship.—Whatever be a man's natural abilities, attainments, notions or profession, our Lord assures us, that "he cannot see the kingdom of God:" he can neither discern its spiritual nature, or the excellence of its blessings and privileges, nor enjoy those blessings. (Note, Matt. 3:2.) This is the unalterable appointment of God; but it has also its foundation in the reason and nature of things. God is perfect in holiness, his law is holy, his gospel is holy, all things relating to true religion are holy and spiritual. This is their glory and excellency: but man by nature is unholy and carnal, and cannot relish or even discern that excellency. God and his law, with the nature of holiness and happiness, are unchangeable: therefore man must change, or he can never be conformed to them, or be happy in them. (Notes, Rom. 8:5—9. 1 Cor. 2:14—16, v. 14.) Every revelation of God requires of sinful man the deepest humiliation; but man is a self-justifying, self-sufficient creature: he must therefore be inwardly and effectually changed, before he can understand the nature and glory of the gospel. Without this, he can see no excellency in the holiness of God, no goodness or justice in the strict and spiritual precepts and awful sanction of the law, no hatefulness in himself, no malignity deserving damnation in his sins: no preciousness and glory in the way of salvation by Christ, no beauty in conformity to his image and character. Consequently he can neither submit, repent, believe, love, nor obey; but he must remain a rebel and an enemy, and a despiser, hater or abuser of the gospel: he cannot therefore be a true Christian, and a spiritual worshipper; nor can he have the meetness for the enjoyments and employments of heaven. He may exercise the functions, and participate the satisfactions, of the animal or the rational life; but he must remain spiritually dead, and incapable of such satisfactions as angels and saints enjoy in heaven, and as pious men experience on earth: even as a watch, or other curious machine, constructed with three distinct parts, may move on regularly as to two of them, when the third is rendered incapable of further motion, unless it be restored by a skill similar to that of the original maker. (Note, Gen. 2:16,17.)—Some render the words "born again," born from above; and no doubt they admit of that meaning: but it is evident that Nicodemus did not thus understand them.—In short, the new-birth is the beginning of spiritual life, without which we can no more live a heavenly life, than we could an earthly one without being born into this world. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Jam. 1:16—18, v. 18. 1 Pet. 1:3—5, v. 3. 22—25. 1 John 2:26—29, v. 29. 3:7—10, v. 9. 4:7,8. 5:1—5, vv. 1,4. 16—18, v. 18.)—'The beginning of Christianity is placed in this; that we know ourselves not only to be in some measure corrupt, but entirely "dead in sin;" so that it is necessary that our nature, as to its qualities, should be created again and anew; which can be effected by no other power, than that of God, by whom we were at first made. Beza. (Notes, Eph. 2:1—3.)—'Jesus, observing that he (Nicodemus) said nothing of the excellency and power of his doctrine, to change the hearts and reform the lives of men ... but only of his miracles, by which it was confirmed, answered and said unto him, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again;" that is, renewed in his mind, will and affections, by the operations of the Holy Spirit, and so become a new creature, ... "he cannot see," that is, enjoy the blessings of "the kingdom of God."' Whithy.

V. 4, 5. Nicodemus, though seriously impressed, seems to have had no distinct view of religion, further than as it related to the outward conduct. (Notes, Luke 11:37—40.) He could not, therefore, understand what our Lord intended; but, adverting to the literal meaning of the words, and observing with what earnestness Jesus insisted on the necessity of being "born again;" he inquired, with great surprise, how this could possibly take place; or how, if possible, it could prepare any one for the kingdom of God. To this our Lord replied, in the same emphatical and decisive manner as before, and to the same effect; except as he further declared the Author and nature of this mysterious work. By "the kingdom of God," he doubtless primarily meant the kingdom of the Messiah, about which the Jews entertained very carnal and erroneous opinions: but as admission into this is necessary, in order to "enter into the kingdom of God" in heaven, both may be included. (Note, Matt. 3:2.) No man "can enter into the kingdom of God," no one can become a true disciple of Christ and an heir of heaven, without that change of which the Holy Spirit is the Author, and purifying fertilizing water is the outward sign. (Note, Ez. 36:25—27.) Water was used among the Jews in "divers washings," or "baptisms." John used it in his baptism, and Jesus appointed it in his initiatory sacrament. This was the emblem of that spiritual washing, without which no man can be admitted into the true church, as a living member of the same. As baptism, in the ordinary course of things, is requisite to the outward profession of Christianity; so regeneration is invariably necessary to the possession of its privileges, and the performance of its duties. (Note, Mark 16:14—16.) Except a man "be born of water, and of the Spirit;" except his heart be purified by that inward washing of the Holy Spirit, of which water has been the constant emblem, "he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (Marg. Ref. See on 3. Note, Tit. 3:4—7, v. 5.)—'If, under the word water, baptism be especially intended, as that which is the peculiar sacrament of our regeneration, the sentence must be taken, as Christ had respect to the general order of the church. Neither yet did he simply bind the grace of God to baptism, as if it was absolutely, and without any exception, necessary; seeing he just after ascribes regeneration to the Spirit, without any mention of water. ... Thus elsewhere the Spirit and fire are joined, but the order is reversed. "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." ... Water is really present in the sacrament of baptism, as an outward sign and seal of the spiritual and divine energy, which inwardly cleanses us. But fire, when joined to the Spirit, cannot be understood otherwise than metaphorically. In this place "the Spirit" being added to "water," is a declaration of the external sacramental baptism; in the other the fire is mentioned as an explanation of the divine energy, taken from a corporeal thing. Beza. (Note, Matt. 3:11,12.)—'Whatever ignorance of the precept, or mistake about the nature of it, renders not men incapable of baptism by the Holy Ghost, can never render them incapable of the salvation promised to the baptized. ... It cannot be purely the want, but the contempt of it, which must condemn us.' Whithy.—If, however, baptism and being "born again" be terms of the same meaning, or if the one invariably accompanies the other, so that all who are rightly baptized are regenerate, and none else; then all who die unbaptized, even infants, as well as all others, all over the earth, and in every age of the world, without exception, are shut out of heaven! A proposition far more dreadful, than any held by the most unfeeling and presumptuous Supralapsarian Calvinists.

Gentile, or Christian, if it were possible, could be of no use to any man: as "that which is born of the flesh," by natural generation from the stock of fallen Adam, "is flesh," carnal, corrupt, and enmity against God; (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 7:18—25, vv. 18,25. 8:1—13, vv. 1,3,4,5,8,9,12,13. Gal. 5:13—25, vv. 13,15—17,19—21,24.) but "that which is born of the Spirit," that which is communicated to the soul from the second Adam, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, "is spirit," is like its Author, of a spiritual and holy nature, and capable of spiritual and holy exercises and enjoyment.—'Christ takes it for granted, as beyond all contradiction, that he must be pure, who would be happy with God. By the word "flesh," therefore, it is meant, that the whole man, as the offspring of man, is impure, as well in his mind as in his body.' Beza. (Notes, Job 14:1—6, v. 4. 15:14—16. Ps. 51:5,6.) The clause, "that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit," cannot mean, that the rational soul, as distinct from the body, is brought into existence by being "born of the Spirit:" but that the man is raised 'from the leath of sin to the life of righteousness,' and so his renewal to holiness is begun. To understand by "the flesh," in the first clause, the body exclusively, would wholly destroy the antithesis; and indeed all connexion between the two parts of the verse. And where would be the need of regeneration, or to be renewed "in the spirit of our mind," if the soul were in itself spiritual, and only the body carnal? In fact, the soul, or heart, is the more immediate seat and source of sin, and the body only or mainly its instrument. (Notes, Prov. 4:23. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 15:15—20.) 'It appears to me impossible, to clear up either the beauty of the antithesis, or the truth of the assertion, on any other interpretation.' Doddridge. The subject is of such importance, in order to understand Christianity, that it deserves the most diligent investigation, and a very careful and humble examination of all those parts of Scripture which relate to it, with constant, fervent prayer for heavenly wisdom and illumination to understand them.—That which is born.] Το γεγεννημενον. 1 John 5:4.

V. 7, 8. Nicodemus saw no adequate reason to be so greatly surprised at our Lord's declaration, that fallen man of every nation and creed, Jews and Pharisees, as well as Gentiles, "must be born again;" as if it were more unintelligible than many other things, the truth and reality of which no man disputed. The wind, for instance, blows from different points of the compass, and more gently or more furiously, "as it listeth;" that is, so far as man is concerned: but though the sound of it is heard, and the effects of it most manifest; yet no man can "tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth." Even to this day, after all improvements in natural science, men can neither account satisfactorily for all the changes of the wind, nor render it at all submissive to their will or command, or counteract its effects. Even so it is with "every one that is born of the Spirit:" the nature and effects of this change are most manifest; the manner in which it is wrought is inexplicable; and its direction, to this or the other person, is independent on the will of man, and according to the sovereign pleasure of the great Creator: for the "willing mind," which God approves, is produced by it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1:10—13. Phil. 2:12,13.) But if man cannot govern or change the wind, or explain those things which relate to it; how can he expect to govern or explain the operations of the Holy Spirit?—As the same word signifies both spirit, and the wind, in the original languages; the similitude has a peculiar propriety, if "being born again" be interpreted of the communication of divine life to "the dead in sin." But if understood of baptism exclusively, or what always accompanies it when rightly administered, there seems nothing appropriate in it. The administration of baptism is evident, and most public, foreseen, and appointed. Every thing relating to it depends on "the will of man," of the baptized person in adults, of parents and sponsors in infants, and of the officiating minister in both cases. But if the things signified, as not inseparable from the right administration of baptism, be intended, the whole depends absolutely on the sovereign will, who commands and governs the winds and waves. (Note, Ez. 37:1—10.)

Where it listeth. (8) Ὁπου θελει. Willeth. Rom. 9:16.—Note, Matt. 6:33,34, v. 34.

V. 9—11. Nicodemus had not been used to hear this new-birth insisted on, by the scribes and priests; nor had he ever made it the immediate subject of his own study, or investigation, or attained to an experience of its nature and effects. he could not therefore understand our Lord's meaning. He was not however willing to reject his instruction, which he had allowed to be confirmed by evident miracles; yet this doctrine, on which he so strenuously insisted, seemed to him inexplicable, and impracticable; and he therefore inquired, as a man in perfect astonishment, "How can these things be?" (Marg. Ref. t.) 'To this our Lord answered, as expressing surprise at his ignorance, by demanding whether he, as a teacher of God's people, could possibly be unacquainted with this essential and important truth. Not only was the new birth absolutely requisite to the existence of true religion in the soul of fallen man, as nothing but a worthless form could subsist without it; but it was evidently contained in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and implied in every passage which required spiritual worship, inward holiness, and heavenly affections, from a fallen creature; or promised to give a new heart, or produce a change of heart. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, Deut. 10:16. 29:4. 30:1—10, v. 6. 1 Chr. 29:10—19. Ps. 51:10. Jer. 4:3,4. 31:31—34. 32:39—41. Ez. 11:17—20. 36:25—27.) Jesus then declared, that he and those servants of God, who in every age concurred with him, spake in this respect what they assuredly knew to be true, and testified what they were most intimately acquainted with: yet the Jews in general, and the Pharisees in particular, would not receive their testimony.—Prophets, apostles, and faithful ministers knew this subject from revelation, from their own experience, and from observation of its effects in others: Jesus knew it in a still higher and more sublime manner. (31,32.)—'There is an implied antithesis, which, in my judgment, should be carefully noted. You, saith Christ, ... teach things which you do not understand, and are believed; we teach a certain and known doctrine; and yet ye will not receive our doctrine. ... He joins himself with the prophets, whose writings were so negligently read in the synagogues.' Beza.—Some expositors think, that our Lord, in the tenth verse, referred to the language of the Jews about proselytes, whom they spake of, as infants new born, &c. but it is not likely that he should lay such stress on any of their traditions or expressions, which on other occasions he decidedly opposed: and the above remark shows what our Lord meant; as Moses and the prophets, which were continually read in their synagogues, joined in his testimony to the necessity of regeneration. So that, even the principal teachers in Israel, who did not understand and teach regeneration, "erred," not knowing the Scriptures, nor the "power of God." As "a teacher of Israel," Nicodemus might know many things concerning the "divers baptisms" of the Mosaic law, the traditionary baptisms of the Pharisees, and even John's baptism. But Christian baptism was not instituted till some time afterwards: and Nicodemus could not at this time be supposed to understand the nature, obligation, and benefits of it. Or, that this baptism was intended to be the initiatory sacrament of Christianity, and indispensably necessary to salvation. Could it then be wonderful, that a "Teacher of Israel" did "not know these things?" or was he deserving of reproof for not knowing, what he never had the means of learning? Our Lord's surprise, and reproving question, must have related to what Nicodemus might have known, and ought to have known. (Notes, 25,26. Matt. 28:19,20.)

A master. (10) Ὁ διδασκαλος. 2. This word with the article implies, that Nicodemus was regarded as an eminent teacher, as well as a ruler, of Israel.

V. 12, 13. The change before described seems here to be meant by "earthly things:" for, as it must be, and continually has been, wrought on earth; so it is comparatively easy to be understood and illustrated; and we may reason and discourse about it far better than about the mysteries which are next spoken of. (Marg. Ref. a.) No creature can find satisfaction, without capacities of enjoyment suited to his situation. Pleasure cannot be experienced without appetite and relish, as well as the means of gratification. Every animal must be in its proper element, in order to be easy and comfortable. The fish could not possibly live, and enjoy life, on dry ground, unless its nature should previously be changed. Holiness and spirituality are not the sinner's element: submission to God, and communion with him, are not his desired enjoyments; nay, he has a rooted antipathy against them. Yet happiness is impossible to a rational creature without holiness; and holiness cannot be so much as begun without "being born again." So that this truth, which men are so apt to deny, and treat as enthusiasm, has as evident a ground in reason, as in Scripture. Let it but be granted, that God is perfectly holy; that happiness consists in his favour, presence, image, and service; and that man by nature has no relish for this kind of happiness: and from these premises (which any one must be very hardy to deny) it demonstratively follows, that "except a man be born again," he could not enjoy happiness, were he admitted into heaven; but for that reason, among others, he never can enter thither. If men will not therefore believe this doctrine, of which we "that are of the earth, and earthly," can reason so plainly, and illustrate by the nature of animals and the grafting of trees, (Miraturque novas frondes, et non sua poma: 'It,' the grafted tree, 'admires new branches, and fruit not its own,' Virgil,) and various other apt similitudes; (Note, Is. 11:6—9.) and which is actually witnessed in its effects whenever sinners are converted; how shall they believe what Jesus testifies to them concerning "heavenly things?" namely, such as relate to the mysteries of the Trinity, to his own eternal Deity, to his incarnation, and redemption by his blood; which could never have been thought of, had not God revealed them, and which must rest wholly on the testimony of Revelation. We may indeed discern glory and suitableness in them when revealed: but we feel that they are sublime and mysterious beyond comparison; and though not contrary to our reason, yet far above it, and out of its reach and province. The knowledge of these things must be derived, immediately and entirely, from above, and received by faith alone: yet no man has ascended thither to fetch down that knowledge: (Marg. Ref. c—f. Deut. 30:12. Notes, Prov. 30:4. Rom. 10:5—11.) nor can it be received, except from Christ, who came down from heaven, when he became "the Son of man:" yet even then he "was in heaven," in respect of his divine nature. For the two natures are so inseparably united in his mysterious Person, that as the apostle says, "the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood," so our Lord says, "the Son of man which is in heaven," when he was here on earth, because One with the eternal Word and Son of God. (Notes, 1:1—3,14,18. Acts 20:28.) This language seems incapable of any other interpretation; and to wrest it to agree with any other doctrine, makes our Lord to speak in the most obscure and unintelligible manner imaginable. Doubtless this was intended as a specimen of those "heavenly things" which he had before mentioned.—'If while I have discoursed ... of those principles of Christianity which both our enlightened reason and experience can easily make good, thou believest not, but findest such difficulties; ... what ... possibility is there, that thou shouldest believe, when I shall tell thee of the great mysteries of salvation, and of those high and incomprehensible matters of another world? ... These are things which no man can tell thee, but he that has been in hea en; and no man hath been there to see them, but he that is now come down from heaven, even that Son of man, (that talketh with thee,) who in respect of his Deity is still in heaven.' Bp. Hall.

V. 14, 15. (Notes, Num. 21:6—9.) This passage in the history of Israel was well known, but the typical meaning seems not to have been at all discovered by the Jews. The promised Messiah was not to be "lifted up" on earth to a glorious throne, as they vainly expected; but to "be lifted up," or exalted, by being suspended on an ignominious cross, for the redemption of his people. (Marg. Ref. h. Note, 12:27—36, vv. 32,34.) Moses, the giver of the law, was ordered to make a serpent of brass, like the fiery serpents, yet perfectly innoxious: this he lifted up on a pole in a conspicuous place, that it might be clearly seen by all the people; and especially by those, who looked at it when mortally bitten by the serpents; and in so doing they were miraculously healed. Thus Jesus, in "the likeness of sinful flesh," in the nature of Adam, by whom sin and death entered into the world, though himself perfectly free from sin, was "lifted up" on the cross, to "redeem us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." This "must" take place, or was previously necessary, in order to the completion of the promises and predictions which God had given, and the satisfaction of his justice in saving sinners In consequence of his crucifixion, Jesus is set forth in the gospel, as preached throughout the world, that "whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have eternal life." This method, which God has devised in his infinite wisdom, is suited to bring the perishing sinner to expect all his salvation from God, and to give him all the glory of it; to promote humility, dependence, and gratitude; to render him submissive and obedient; and to teach him every salutary lesson, by looking to that one Object, from which he derives his peace, hope, and comfort. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, 1:29. Heb. 12:2,3.) Thus the important change, which takes place in the heart, and is manifested in the life, of every true believer, proves the efficacy of faith in a crucified Saviour, as evidently, as the restored health and vigour of the almost expiring Israelite proved that his expectation of recovery, by looking to the brazen serpent, was not a vain presumption.—'Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Barnabas say, this was a figure of the cross; and that it was a symbol of salvation; he that turned to it being preserved from death, not by what he saw, but by the Saviour of all men.' Whitby. (Note, 2 Kings 18:4.)—How strongly do our Lord's words show the actual state of all men! They must perish without a Saviour, and without faith in that Saviour!

V. 16. The whole design of man's redemption originated in the love of God to the world, even to the apostate race of men; to "the whole world, that lieth in wickedness," or "in the wicked one." (Note, 1 John 5:19.) This could not be approbation, or complacency: for he judged them deserving of his final indignation, and meet objects of his holy abhorrence and so criminal, that he could not honourably show them mercy, except by an expedient more suited to expose the desert of their rebellion, than even the eternal punishment of the whole race would have been. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10.)—The love of God to the world was therefore good-will, compassion, benevolence. (Marg. Ref. m.) He "so loved the world," that he not only purposed to pardon sin, and to give heaven to those who repented; but (when the honour of his justice and holiness seemed to oppose the exercise of mercy,) "he gave his only begotten Son," the co-equal partaker of his divine nature, a person of infinite dignity and excellency, and infinitely beloved by him, compared with whom all worlds were as nothing, to "become flesh," that in our nature he might atone for our sins, by his sufferings and death upon the cross; that, this obstacle being removed, he might forgive, save, and bless with everlasting life, all those of every nation who believe in this divine Saviour, but who must otherwise have perished for ever. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 1:1—3,14,18. Rom. 8:32—34. Col. 1:15—17. 1 Tim. 3:15,16. Heb. 1:1—4.) The world, or the race of men, (and not merely the one nation of Israel, for whose sake alone the Jews supposed that the Messiah would come,) is therefore now borne with, as under a dispensation of mercy; sinners in general are called on to believe in Christ, and invited to partake of the blessing; believers without exception are saved. (Notes, 1:29. 1 John 2:1,2. 4:9—12. 5:11,12.) But, as true faith springs from regeneration, and as "the Spirit quickens whom he will;" those alone who are "born of the Spirit," willingly avail themselves of this most gracious provision: and "known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." (Notes, 3—8. 1:10—13, v. 13.)

V. 17, 18. Our Lord further showed Nicodemus, that God did not send his son into the world, (at his first coming,) "to condemn, or judge, the world, as might previously have been expected when the approach of so glorious and holy a person was announced to a world of rebels and apostates. This was not the purpose of his incarnation, ministry, and work on earth: on the contrary he came to procure and reveal salvation, that sinners of every nation might be invited to partake of it. Insomuch that the man, who believes in Christ, "is not judged:" he no longer remains under condemnation, and "shall not come into condemnation," how many or heinous soever his sins have been. (*Marg. —27. Rom. 8:1,2.) But the unbeliever "is condemned already:" he has rejected the only method of pardon and reconciliation which God ever revealed; he remains under the sentence denounced by the law, as a condemned criminal reserved for execution; and his guilt is exceedingly aggravated, by his refusal to "believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God," and by despising the glorious display of the divine wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy made in that method of salvation. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, 19—21,27—36, vv. 35,36.)—In the name, &c. (18) 'Though the name of a person be often put for the person himself; yet I think it farther intimated in this expression, that the person spoken of is great and magnificent; and therefore it is generally used to express either God the Father, or our Lord Jesus Christ.'—Doddridge.

To condemn. (17) Ἵνα κρινῃ. "That he should judge." 18. 12:47,48. 16:11. 1 Cor. 11:31,32. As "to judge" unpardoned sinners would be to "condemn" them, the translation here does not at all affect the meaning.

V. 19—21. Unbelief is not a mere speculative mistake, into which an honest mind may be led; but it originates from the wickedness and enmity to God of the heart of man: so that this is the reason of the unbeliever's condemnation, and the test by which he will be judged; "that Light is come into the world," to show men the perfections, truth, and will of God, and the way of salvation from wrath and sin. But men, as left to themselves, love ignorance, delusion, idolatry, superstition, or infidelity, in preference to it, because more congenial to the pride, alienation, and rebellion of their hearts, and the secret or open wickedness of their lives. (Notes, 1:4—9. 7:3—10. 8:41—47. Rom. 8:5—9. Heb. 3:7—19, v. 12.) For every one, who habitually loves and practices any kind of evil, hates and shuns that light which detects and exposes it: thus men keep aloof from the true gospel of Christ, and run into various perversions of it; lest it should disquiet their consciences, interfere with their indulgence in sin, or detect the fallacy of their presumptuous confidence. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Job 24:13—17. Eph. 5:8—14.) But he, who acts uprightly and conscientiously, and really desires to know and do the whole will of God without reserve, is glad to bring his creed, his character, and whole spirit and conduct, to the Light, that they may be scrutinized by it; that he may be further instructed and directed; and that it may be made manifest that "his works are wrought in God," by virtue of union with him, and grace derived from him, according to his will, for his glory, and as accepted by him. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Note, Is. 26:12—18, v. 12. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 10. 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. 5:5—8, v. 5. 17. Gal. 5:22—26, vv. 22,23. Eph. 2:4—10, v. 10.)—These are important truths of general application: yet they were spoken with a peculiar reference to the case of the Pharisees; and it was thus declared, that the opposition, which would be made by them to Jesus and his doctrine, arose from the wickedness of their hearts and lives, which could not endure the light of his spiritual ministry. Nicodemus therefore, and those to whom he might report the result of this conference, were warned not to "reject the counsel of God against themselves."—Some think, that the conduct of Nicodemus, in coming to Jesus by night, as if he "loved darkness rather than light," is gently reproved.—Thus our Lord set before this "teacher of Israel" the grand outlines of Christian truth; probably he enlarged more fully on the several particulars: and though Nicodemus did not clearly comprehend his meaning, he was gradually led further into the knowledge of the truth, and afterwards grew bolder in making a profession of it. V. 22—24. Our Lord, soon after this, left Jerusalem, and retired into the cities or villages of Judea, where he preached, and collected followers; and his more stated disciples baptized them. (Note, 4:1—4.) It is not probable, that they baptized in that form which he afterwards prescribed; but after the manner of John, and as introductory to the more complete establishment of his religion. The place where John was preaching and baptizing at the same time, is not mentioned elsewhere: there were "many waters" in it, which rendered it convenient to him, as he still baptized great numbers. (Note, Matt. 3:5,6.) This must have preceded any thing recorded of Christ's ministry by the other evangelists. (Note, Matt. 4:12—17.)—It is remarkable, that we read nothing of the apostles or disciples baptizing, before our Lord's ascension, except in these few passages of John's gospel. Yet the disciples of Jesus are expressly distinguished from those of John: and at this time he "made and baptized more disciples than John." (4:1.) It must then be supposed, that the disciples of Jesus were baptized in his name: and that this baptism discriminated them, not only from those Jews who had not been baptized; but also from those who had been baptized by John as his disciples, yet had not become the professed disciples of Jesus, and received his baptism. But Christian baptism, "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," was at this time not instituted: and as circumcision still continued in force, as the initiatory sacrament of the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants; the baptism of Jesus was doubtless of adults alone. It appears then to me, that all, who at this time or afterwards, during our Lord's personal ministry, who by means of John's testimony, or in other ways, professed themselves the disciples of Jesus, as the Messiah, the Son of God, in an intelligent manner, were baptized in the name of Jesus: and, whether he personally baptized any individuals or not, (for the language may only mean, that in general he did not baptize, but his disciples,) all those above described were thus baptized, though we do not further read of it.—Among these we may number the 120, who met at Jerusalem after the day of Pentecost, and most of the 500 brethren to whom he appeared in Galilee. So that after the institution of Christian baptism, just before our Lord's ascension, those who had thus been baptized in his name, were not rebaptized. Nor were they considered as unbaptized persons; neither should they be adduced as a precedent for unbaptized persons being employed in preaching the gospel, and baptizing others, or receiving and administering the Lord's supper.—Most of the apostles and primitive disciples had been baptized both with John's baptism, and with that of Jesus as "the Messiah the Son of the living God:" and the rest had been baptized with Jesus's baptism, which was an anticipation, suited to existing circumstances, of the more complete form, when Baptism became the initiatory sacrament of Christianity, and the sign and seal of regeneration.—Whether either John, or Jesus during his personal ministry, baptized women, is no where expressly said: and the argument about the subjects and mode of baptism has no immediate connexion with the subject: for that rests exclusively on those Scriptures which relate to baptism, as superseding circumcision, in becoming the initiatory sign and seal of the covenant.—The evangelist here speaks of John the Baptist's imprisonment, as well known; but no where mentions any further particulars, either of that, or of his being put to death by Herod. Had he not been satisfied, that these important facts had been recorded by other divinely inspired writers, he would hardly have passed them over in this manner, after having so particularly insisted on the ministry and testimony of John. This confirms the opinion, that he intended his gospel, as a kind of supplement to the three other gospels, which had before been published.

Much water. (23) Πολλα ὑδατα. "Many waters." Rev. 1:15.—Των ὑδατων των πολλων, Rev. 17:1.

V. 25, 26. This question seems to have been, whether the baptism of John, or that of Jesus, or the traditional or the ceremonial washings, were most efficacious to take away sin. (Marg. Ref. g. Note, 2:6—11, v. 6.) Some might argue, that there was no end of innovating, and that they might as well adhere to the Pharisees, as follow either of the new teachers. This would also further excite the jealousy of John's disciples, who complained to their master, that all men came to Jesus to be baptized of him, so that John had lost his influence and popularity by bearing testimony to Jesus. Thus they seem obliquely to have censured our Lord, and to have intimated dan, [h]to whom thou barest witness, behold, the same baptizeth, [k]and all men come to him.

27 John answered and said, [l]A man can [m]receive nothing, except it be given him [m]from heaven.

28 Ye yourselves bear me witness, that [n]I said, I am not the Christ, [o]but that I am sent before him.

that John ought to retract the testimony which he had given in his favour.—Many ancient manuscripts and versions read, "between John's disciples and a Jew," in the singular: but it does not appear that this materially alters the meaning of the passage. As the language of the New Testament always distinguishes our Lord's disciples from the other Jews, we cannot suppose that a disciple of Jesus was meant. (Marg. Ref. h—k.)

V. 27—36. The jealousy of John's disciples for the honour of their teacher, gave him an opportunity of bearing still fuller and more explicit testimony to our Lord. He laid it down as an universal truth, that "a man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Jam. 1:16—18.) Thence he had received his commission, qualifications, and instructions; and he was fully satisfied with the place and work assigned him: (Note, Eph. 4:7—10.) but Jesus came with a far superior commission, and for a more important design; and indeed John's ministry was superseded by that of Jesus. John's disciples knew that he had always expressly declared he was not the Messiah, but merely his servant and forerunner: why then should it trouble them, that superior honour was rendered to him? (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 1:19—34.)—Jesus was indeed "the Bridegroom," who had loved, and would prepare and espouse his church of redeemed sinners to himself, and ennoble, enrich, and bless it for ever by that sacred union, in which he would greatly delight and be glorified. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 3:9—13. 4:10. Is. 54:4,5. 62:1—5, vv. 4,5. Hos. 2:18—20. Matt. 9:14,15. 2 Cor. 11:1—6, vv. 2,3. Eph. 5:22—33, vv. 23—27,29,32. Rev. 19:7—10.) And John was honoured as "the friend of the Bridegroom," and employed in collecting disciples; and thus was an instrument in effecting these gracious espousals. He therefore stood and heard his orders, and gladly obeyed them; he rejoiced greatly to hear his voice and to witness his glory; and this his joy was now complete, in that he had heard and seen the promised Messiah, and found that the people flocked to him. He also knew, that Jesus would continue to increase in honour and influence, for "of his government and peace there would be no end:" but for himself he must expect to be less and less considered; nor did this at all deduct from his rejoicing in Christ. (Marg. Ref. q—t.) He was sensible that this was reasonable and right: for Jesus came from heaven as the Son of God, and was "above all" men, angels, or creatures; while John was of the earth, a mere sinful mortal man, who could only speak in the language of the earth, concerning the more plain subjects of religion; but Jesus came from heaven to speak of heavenly things, in language suitable to their sublime and mysterious nature; as of matters familiar to him, being what "he had seen and heard." Yet very few, and, as it were, none, compared with the whole nation, received his testimony. Those few, however, who acknowledged him as the Messiah, and profited by his instructions, "set their seal" to the truth of God, in respect of the fulfilment of his ancient prophecies and promises, and publicly declared their assurance that his word was to be depended on, in every possible case, as infallibly sure. (Marg. Ref. u—c. Notes, 9—13.) For as Jesus came from the bosom of the Father, his words were indeed the words of God, and implicitly to be credited: and, as the great Prophet of the church, the Father gave him "the Spirit; not by measure," as to inferior prophets, but in unmeasurable fulness, from him to be communicated to all others who were sent by him. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Is. 59:20,21. Eph. 4:7—10, v. 7.) Indeed "the Father loved" and delighted in the Son, and in his mediatorial undertaking and work, because they so greatly glorified his name: and therefore he had intrusted to him, as Mediator all authority and judgment; had committed to him every thing relative to the government of the church and of the world; and had determined that "all fulness should dwell" in him. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, 5:20—29. Col. 1:18—20.) Thus everlasting life could only be had by faith in him, and might assuredly be thus obtained: whereas every one, whether he were a disciple of the Pharisees, or of John, or whatever his character and profession might be, who "did not believe in the Son of God," or obey him, (for so the word is often rendered,) could not see life, or partake of salvation; but the wrath of God must for ever rest upon him; as it does on every sinner till he believe in Christ. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, 14—21. 1:29. Mark 16:13—16. 1 Thes. 1:9,10.)—'Why do you endeavour to add any thing to my condition? This is the lot of all men, that they cannot attain even the least thing of themselves; but whatever they have of excellency, they must ascribe it to the bounty of God. You must, however, confess that you have heard from me, what is His pre-eminence, and what is the nature of my ministry, namely, that I am sent as the forerunner of Christ. Why therefore should you desire me to compare myself with him? Truly it is right and just, that his excellency should gradually more and more shine forth, and that I should be gradually eclipsed. But nothing could possibly occur more rejoicing to my heart: and so far from endeavouring to prevent your going over from me to him; I, on the contrary, diligently warn you, that all your salvation depends on him alone.' Beza.—It was certainly the aim of John to influence his disciples to become the disciples of Jesus; and to convince them, that in no other way could they escape the wrath of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. Numbers are convinced in their consciences, concerning the truth of many doctrines of Christianity, and of th piety and faithfulness of its ministers, but they dare not avow their sentiments in the face of an ungodly world, or among despisers of the gospel: and, though we must not excuse such as are afraid or ashamed to associate with those whom they believe to be "sent of God:" yet we must not hastily reject them, lest we should "quench the smoking flax:" for by proper instruction and encouragement they may at length become more bold and decided.—True religion consists especially in the right state of the heart: and as he, who has life and death at his disposal, has so repeatedly and solemnly assured us, that "except a man be born again, he cannot see," or "enter into, the kingdom of God;" it surely becomes every one seriously to inquire into the meaning of this important declaration, and earnestly and perseveringly to beseech the Lord to direct him to a proper solution of that inquiry. In this way, a man may hear, read, meditate, pray, and wait for a considerable time, before he clearly enters into the meaning; yet he will gradually and certainly obtain an experimental knowledge of it. But surely, it is the most absurd presumption in the world, to expect future happiness without either knowing what it is to be "born again," or inquiring further about it; as if we could enter heaven in defiance of Christ, and by so doing prove his most solemn and repeated declaration to be a falsehood! (P. O. Matt. 24:29—35.) Nor

CHAPTER IV.

Jesus leaves Judea, 1—3. In the absence of his disciples, he discourses with a Samaritan woman concerning the water of life, 4—15; brings her sins to remembrance, 16—19; shows her the nature of acceptable worship, 20—24; and declares himself to be the Messiah, 25, 26. The disciples return, and are surprised to see him thus employed, 27. The woman goes to inform her neighbours, and induces them to come and hear him, 28—30. Jesus shows his disciples his delight in his Father's work; and the blessed harvest about to be reaped by them, with reference to the Samaritans coming to him, 31—38. The Samaritans believe in him, and he continues among them for two days, 39—42. He returns to Cana; and heals a nobleman's son who lay sick at Capernaum, 43—54.

WHEN, therefore, [a]the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard [b]that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John,

2 (Though [c]Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples,)

3 He [d]left Judea, and departed [e]again into Galilee.

4 And [f]he must needs go through Samaria.

5 Then cometh he to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar, near to [g]the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.

6 Now Jacob's well was there. Jesus therefore, [h]being wearied with his journey, [i]sat thus on the well: and it was about [k]the sixth hour.

is it safer or wiser to interpret it of any notion or impression, which leaves a man proud, carnal, and an enemy of God and holiness, even as he was before; which neither evidences his title to the kingdom, nor gives him any meetness for its holy employments. But "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him." (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) To evade conviction therefore, it is common for man to put an absurd construction on the words of those who "speak according to the oracles of God," and to draw ridiculous conclusions from them; and then to inquire, whether this be not very foolish. Whereas the folly lies in the misconstruction and misapplication, and not in the doctrine itself, which appears evident, reasonable, and wise to every teachable inquirer.—The Lord will explain his declarations, but he will not retract them: nor will he alter the rules of admission into his kingdom, to humour the prejudices of any set of men whatever: and the true baptism is not "that which is outward in the flesh, but that which is inward, even that of the heart," by the work of the Holy Spirit, "whose praise is not of men but of God." (Note, Rom. 2:25—29.)

V. 6—11. Without regeneration we cannot come to God, or walk with him, or spiritually worship him, or enjoy him. "The carnal mind," which belongs to us all as "born of the flesh," is "enmity against God," so that "they who are in the flesh cannot please him." But happy are they who are "born of the Spirit," and made spiritually minded: they can discern the things of God, and relish them; religion becomes their element; they are made subjects of that "kingdom of God, which is in righteousness, peace, and joy," and heirs of the incorruptible inheritance of heaven. Let it not then be marvelled at, that Jesus has said, "ye must be born again:" it is enough that the Author, the nature, the necessity, and the effects of this gracious work are manifest, though the manner and rule of it be not known. Can we indeed understand fully how the most ordinary and regular effects in nature are produced? Can we comprehend all that relates to our natural formation in the womb, and birth into the world? Or can we change the course which God has established? One ship is wafted into port, and another dashed upon the rocks, by the wind, as it pleases God. The sailors can neither comprehend the reasons of it, nor repel its effects: but yet they may use means, and employ their skill to avail themselves of a favourable wind, or to retire from the effects of a furious tempest: and we may also use means, and expect the blessing of God on them. It is, alas, true, that there are very many "teachers in Israel," many professed ministers of Christianity, and those of great repute, who are ready to say, "How can these things be?" Nay, they positively declare that they cannot be; and that all are enthusiasts or hypocrites who profess them. In an inferior sense, however, we may say with humble confidence, "We testify that which we have seen," heard, experienced, and observed, whether men will receive or reject our testimony.

V. 12—21. If more obvious truths be rejected, we need not wonder that the great mysteries of redemption, by the blood of the incarnate Son of God, are controverted or neglected; for how can men believe that this glorious Person, the Creator of all worlds, atoned for the sins of his enemies by his ignominious death upon the cross; when they are not sensible, that their carnal hearts must be changed by new creating grace, before they can share with delight the holy joys of heaven? If they do not believe that, which is as capable of proof, illustration, and comprehension, as earthly things in general are; how can they believe that the Son of man was so "One with the Father," that he was in heaven when teaching here on earth; and that he actually is present with his people here on earth, now that "he ever liveth to appear in the presence of God for them?" (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20. Acts 3:19—21.) These are "heavenly things," and far out of the reach of all who judge of God by carnal sense or purblind reason: yet in them is contained the great plan of God for "destroying the works of the devil," and the healing of those who have been mortally wounded with the venom of that old serpent. However infidels, scribes, or Pharisees may deride or revile; still Christ crucified, when beheld with the eye of faith, brings life and salvation to the soul of perishing sinners; and there is no other way of escaping everlasting misery. But, if we so look to him as to be saved from wrath; we shall also be delivered from the power of sin; restored gradually to spiritual health; and transformed into the image of that glorious Object which is exhibited in the gospel.—Words can never express how free and excellent the love of God to a sinful world has been, in "giving his only begotten Son" to be the "propitiation for our sins." Did it ever enter into the heart of an earthly prince to give his only son, his beloved, to suffer an ignominious death, in order that he might honourably save the lives of some base traitors who had aimed to subvert his throne? Yet even this would be little and mean, compared with the love of God to rebellious man. But though our God is so ready to pardon all those who "believe in the name of his only begotten Son," whom he "sent into the world, not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved;" yet his infinite love will lead to the deeper condemnation of all who continue to "neglect so great salvation." The believer indeed "is not condemned," and "shall not come into condemnation:" but the unbeliever "is condemned already;" the wrath of God abideth on him; and he goes about continually under that awful load which is sufficient to sink him into everlasting misery. Nor is this unbelief a light or venial matter: it springs from enmity against God, his truth, his law, and his glory; and from love of sin in some form or other. "Men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil;" but this would not have been so fully proved, if "Light had not come into the world," and been hated by them. And is it proper that men should hate God, his truth, knowledge, and holiness, and love wickedness and Satan's service, with impunity? They may indeed shelter themselves under some plausible pretext, or varnish it over with some specious appearance; but they have a secret hatred of the truth, because it opposes their favourite iniquities: they wish to disbelieve, and then seek for arguments to satisfy themselves in infidelity. Let us remember it: The Judge has declared, that unbelief springs from this source, and that "every one who doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." Let us judge ourselves, and bring our characters and conduct to his word, to be assayed by it: let us beseech him to discover to us the secret motives by which we are actuated, and to prevent our being deceived by Satan and our own hearts, and so lead and guide us in the safe and happy way to everlasting life and felicity.

V. 22—36. The same state of heart and mind which leads to bigotry and formality in religion, produces also envy, ambition, and jealousy of those who seem to outshine us: but true excellency and sanctifying grace are combined with deep humility, submission to God, and a willing dependence on him. As "a man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven," let us seek all our blessings from thence; give God all the glory of whatever we have or do; occupy with our talents as we are able; rejoice in the honour and service of Christ, the condescending Bridegroom of his church; stand and hear his voice, and seek our happiness in his presence and favour. And should we be laid aside from usefulness, and see others "increase whilst we decrease," and are eclipsed and obscured by their superior and increasing talent, zeal, and success; let us pray to be enabled to bear it meekly, yea thankfully, that Christ may be more honoured by it; and that numbers of such burning and shining lights may be sent forth into every part of the earth, when we are neglected or forgotten, as laid aside, and become as a broken vessel. Let us attend to him, "who cometh from above and is above all," that we may simply receive heavenly things from his testimony; and neither call any one father or master, nor "lean to our own understanding," as all men, "being of the earth are earthly, and speak of the earth." And though few indeed thus "set to their seal that God is true:" let us seek so to honour his word, that he may seal his salvation to us, by the Spirit of his Son "shedding abroad his love in our hearts." This is the only way of everlasting life, through faith in the Son of God, whom "the Father loveth, and into whose hand all things are given;" for there is no salvation for sinners in any other: and 'he that believeth not shall without doubt perish everlastingly.'

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—4. In many manuscripts and ancient versions, the chapter begins as follows. "When therefore Jesus knew that the Pharisees had heard that he made and baptized," &c.—Our Lord did not see good to preserve his life by a succession of miracles; and the time was distant, when he purposed to give himself into the hands of his enemies: he therefore avoided every thing, which could needlessly excite their jealousy and indignation. He 7 There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jesus saith unto her, [l]Give me to drink.

8 (For his disciples were gone away unto the city [m]to buy meat.)

9 Then saith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, [n]askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? [o]For the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.

10 Jesus answered and said unto her, [p]If thou knewest the gift of God, [q]and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; [r]thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee [s]living water.

11 The woman saith unto him, Sir, [t]thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water?

12 Art [u]thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle?

13 Jesus answered and said unto her, [x]Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again:

14 But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him [y]shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him [z]shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

15 The woman saith unto him, Sir, [a]give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw. [Practical Observations.] seems, however, to have continued a considerable time in Judea, preaching and collecting disciples: but this at length gave umbrage to the Pharisees, (the most powerful party in the Sanhedrim,) who heard that he received, by baptism, greater numbers as disciples than John did; and on hearing this he left Judea to return into Galilee. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) It is observable, that our Lord did not baptize with his own hands. Perhaps he chose to act as the Head of the church, who baptizes with the Holy Spirit, and therefore left his servants to baptize with water: perhaps he saw that disputes would best be prevented by his not baptizing, lest those who had this peculiar distinction should glory in it: and perhaps he meant to show, that preaching the gospel is in itself a far higher and more honourable employment, than the administration of the external signs of the covenant, which have generally been exalted too much, by those who have carefully observed them. (Notes, Acts 10:44—48. 1 Cor. 1:17—19.) It cannot, however, be certainly concluded from this observation, that he never had, in any instance, baptized. It was not his practice, at the time spoken of, or his general custom. Yet he might have baptized a few of his first constant followers, whom he employed afterwards to baptize others. Thus he instituted at first the sacrament of the Lord's supper; but ever after it has been administered by his disciples. (Note, 3:22—24.)—In returning to Galilee, the road lay through Samaria, and Jesus "must needs" go that way, unless he would go very far about: but he had also secret purposes for taking the road in which Sychar was situated. (Note, Luke 7:11—17.)

V. 5—9. Sychar is supposed to have been the same as Sichem, or Shechem; and to have been so named from the drunkenness of the inhabitants; for Sichar, or Sychar, signifies drunk, or drunkenness, in Hebrew and Syriac. (Note, Is. 28:1—4.)—In a field which Jacob bequeathed to Joseph, there was a well, which tradition reported to have belonged to Jacob. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, Gen. 48:22. Josh. 24:29—32, v. 32.) At this place our Lord arrived at the sixth hour, or about noon, for there seems no reason to suppose that John computed time differently than the other evangelists; (1:39.) and "being wearied with his journey he sat thus on the side of the well," or near to it; taking the poor accommodations as he found them, though the seat would be uneasy, and perhaps there was no shelter from the meridian sun. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) The Samaritans were not generally disposed to receive the Jews into their houses: (Notes, Luke 9:51—56.) he therefore did not attempt to go into the town, but sent the disciples to buy some necessary provisions; as if he intended, after making a homely meal by the well's side, to walk forward in the afternoon. In the meanwhile, a woman came to draw water, and Jesus being thirsty, condescended to become her supplicant for a draught of it; intending doubtless by this method to engage her in conversation. Accordingly, she expressed her surprise that he, whom she knew by his apparel to be a Jew, should ask water of her, a Samaritan. How could he think of becoming her petitioner? Or how could he expect any favour from her? For the inveteracy between the two nations and sects was so great, that they generally confined all their intercourse to matters of mere necessity, and mutually refused to ask, or perform, any actions of friendship or kindness to each other. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Note, Luke 10:30—37.) These words are the evangelist's observation, and not the reason assigned by the woman for her question.—'By the traditions of the Pharisees, the Jews might buy of them, and therefore Christ's disciples do not scruple at this; (8) but they were not to borrow any thing of them, or receive any kindness from them, or drink of their water, or eat of their morsels; for they bound them under an anathema, not to eat of the fruit, or morsel, of a Cuthæan; and held this as bad as eating swine's flesh. But Christ, despising such traditions as had no foundation, either in the law of God, or in equity; and tended to the impairing the laws of common friendship or humanity, asks drink of this Samaritan woman, and eateth with them.' Whitby. (Note, 2 Kings 13:41. Neh. 13:23—30.)

V. 10—15. Our Lord did not expressly notice the woman's narrow prejudices; but directed her attention to matters of greater importance. He told her, that, though she should refuse him the small favour which he had asked, because he was a Jew; yet he was ready to confer far greater benefits on her, though a Samaritan Had she known the plenteous mercy and bounty of God, the value and freeness of his Gift to sinful men, (Note, 3:16.) and her urgent need of it; and had she been apprized of the character, authority, and grace of him with whom she was conversing; she would have made her request to him for "living water:" and if she asked him, he would certainly bestow it on her.—"The gift of God" may either mean in general, his free grace to sinners, or the gift of his own Son to be their Saviour, and procure for them all spiritual blessings: but the living water seems especially to mean the Holy Spirit, in his sanctifying and comforting influences, through which his salvation is applied to the soul. (Marg. Ref. p—s. Notes, Ex. 17:5,6. Is. 44:3—5. Ez. 36:25—27. 1 Cor. 10:1—5. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:1.) His influences may be compared to water, because of the inexhaustible abundance which is provided: the gratuitous manner in which they are communicated; and their purifying, fertilizing, and refreshing efficacy. This is "living water," as it confers, sustains, and perfects, spiritual life; and as it is continually flowing pure from "the Fountain of life" for our use, till we come to the enjoyment of eternal life. All who know the value of these blessings, and the power and grace of Christ, ask him for them; and all who ask obtain them. (Note, 7:37—39.) But the Samaritan woman supposed that our Lord meant "running water," which is sometimes called living water, both in the Scriptures, (Gen. 26:19. marg. Lev. 14:5. Heb.) and in the heathen poets. ('Donec me flumine vivo abluero,' Virg.) 'In this sense, the water of springs and rivers would be denominated living, and that of cisterns and lakes,' (or rather ponds,) '... dead, because motionless.' Campbell. She therefore inquired whence he expected to obtain this "living water:" he could not get it out of that well, which was very deep, as he had nothing to draw with; and there was no other well nigh at hand. Yet she seems to have had some idea of his being an extraordinary person, and therefore she addressed him with a degree of respect; intimating that if he spake of some water to be procured in a supernatural manner, she wished to be informed whether he were more honourable and powerful than the patriarch Jacob, who had used that well, and left it to his posterity.—She called Jacob the father of the Samaritans, though they were generally of another race. Our Lord, however, let this groundless claim also pass unnoticed; and observed, that "whosoever drank of that water, would thirst again:" he would soon be as thirsty as ever, and might at length die of thirst, and finally perish. (Note, Luke 16:24—26.) But the nature of the water of which he spake was such, that "whosoever drank of it, would thirst no more for ever." (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, Matt. 5:6. Rev. 7:13—17, v. 16.) He would thirst for more and more of it, but it would be ever at hand to satisfy his desires; it would deliver him from vitiated inclinations, and be "within him," as a well or fountain of water, springing up in all holy affections and consolations, till perfected in everlasting life: this, as the words must imply, it certainly would be, notwithstanding all possible opposition from the world, the flesh, and the devil.—This language the woman did not understand: and she answered as one in amazement, or half disposed to ridicule; desiring Jesus to give her some of this extraordinary water, that she might no more feel the inconvenience of thirst, nor have the trouble of fetching water from the well.—Nothing, &c. V. 16—18. The woman could not understand our Lord's words, because she had no conviction of sin, or thirst after spiritual blessings; yet she would afterwards remember them with great advantage. But to prepare her for receiving the truth, he next "called her sins to remembrance;" for this was no doubt part of his design, when he said, "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." She, however, being willing to conceal her shame, endeavoured to evade the subject, by declaring that she 'had no husband:" and Jesus allowed the truth of this assertion, in a manner which showed that he was fully acquainted with all her past conduct. It is not certain whether all her five husbands had died, or whether she had been divorced from some of them: but at that time she cohabited with a man who was not her husband. If she had left her husband to live with another man, it could hardly have been said, that "she had no husband;" and if we suppose, that the person with whom she lived was "not her husband," but the husband of another woman; the words of our Lord will contain such an express declaration that polygany was unlawful, and that the secondary wife was in fact an adulteress, as would hardly have been made, without further explanation, on this occasion. So that it is probable, she lived with a man to whom she had never been married according to the custom and order of that age and people. This shows, that a recognition before witnesses, and duly authenticated, is necessary to marriage, and distinguishes it from fornication. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ruth 4:11,12. Matt. 19:3—9.)—'Five husbands from whom thou hast been divorced for thy adulteries.' Whitby. This is neither said, nor hinted at, in the narrative: neither is it at all probable. The adulteress was punishable by death, according to the Mosaic law: (Note, 8:3—11, v. 2.) and it is likely, that the Samaritans so far regarded that law, as not to suffer a woman five times convicted of adultery, and divorced for it, to escape with impunity.

V. 19, 20. This explicit reference to the woman's past history by an entire stranger, when probably most of it was concealed from all her neighbours, satisfied her that Jesus was a prophet, and she frankly confessed her conviction: (Marg. Ref. d, e.) but to divert the conversation from a subject so disgraceful to her, she requested of him to inform her, whether the Samaritans or the Jews were right in the grand subject of controversy between them. Adhering to the groundless pretence, that the Samaritans were descended from the stock of Israel, she observed that their fathers worshipped on mount Gerizim, the centre of their religion at that time; whereas the Jews contended that they ought to worship at Jerusalem. Abraham and Jacob erected altars at Shechem, which was very near to mount Gerizim; and from that mountain God ordered the blessings to be pronounced, while the curses were spoken from mount Ebal. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes Deut. 11:26—30. 27:1—13. Josh. 8:30—35.) From these and similar premises the Samaritans inferred, that Gerizim was the place where the temple of God ought to have been built, and his sacrifices offered; and that the Jews were schismatics and sectarians: and they rejected the greatest part of the Old Testament, perhaps because it so expressly and continually declared, that Zion was the place which God had chosen for his residence. (Marg. Ref. g.) Indeed there was no temple on mount Gerizim, till Sanballat built one there, after the days of Nehemiah. (Notes, 2 Kings 17:24—41. Ezra 4:1—6,17—24. Neh. 13:23—30, v. 28.) This had been destroyed by John Hyrcanus, about one hundred and thirty-one years before Christ; but probably it had been rebuilt, though with less magnificence. The Samaritans, however, thought the example of the patriarchs greatly in their favour; and this woman, notwithstanding her immorality, was eager in the controversy.

V. 21—24. In answer to this, our Lord assured the woman, (if she would "believe him" as a Prophet,) that the time was even then arrived, when all these disputes would be superseded: for neither mount Gerizim, nor Jerusalem, should much longer be especially appropriated to the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, Mal. 1:9—11, v. 11.) The Samaritans indeed "worshipped they knew not what:" they knew not the perfections of God; their worship was not regulated according to his commandments; their hope of acceptance was not grounded on his promises; their whole system was a fabric of superstition, ignorance, or imposture; a human device without any divine rule or warrant: for they rejected the greatest part of the sacred oracles, and misinterpreted the rest. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, 8:54—59, v. 55. 16:1—3. Acts 17:22—25.) On the other hand the religion of the Jews was from God: they had his oracles entire; a succession of prophets had been sent among them; they worshipped the true God as revealed by his word, in the ordinances which he had instituted, and with a ground of assurance that they would be accepted, provided they were not hypocritical in their services.—Especially the promised Saviour was to arise from among the Jews: to him all the types referred, all the prophets bare witness, and all believers looked and found salvation; and through him all their ordinances became 'means of grace.' (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Ps. 68:19,20. Is. 12:1—3, v. 2.) Yet the appointed period of that dispensation was come, and thenceforth the true worshippers would not be restricted to any place for their spiritual sacrifices. God was about to be revealed, as the God and Father of the Messiah, and in him the Father of all believers in every nation; and he would seek out immense multitudes "to worship him in spirit and truth." For as he is a Spirit, immaterial, holy, omnipresent, and intimately acquainted with the inmost soul of man: so those who acceptably "worship him, must worship him in spirit and truth." Splendid temples, costly vestments, multiplied sacrifices, and external ceremonies with types and shadows, have nothing in them suited to his nature; and could only be appointed for a time, to be "figures of good things to come." The spirit, or soul of man, as influenced by the Holy Spirit, must worship God, and have communion with him: knowledge of his perfections, reverential fear, humiliation as creatures and sinners, hope in his mercy and truth, regard to his word, love of his excellency, earnest desires after his favour and image, gratitude for his goodness, delight in his service, zeal for his glory, submission to his will, and cheerful dependence on his grace and providence; these spiritual affections, expressed in fervent prayers, supplications, praises, and thanksgivings, form that worship of an upright heart, in which God delights and is glorified. The redemption of Christ, the ministry of the word, and the work of the Holy Spirit, concur in forming such worshippers, and rendering them accepted: and nothing can be pleasing to God, which has not in it something of this nature.—'Not with carnal sacrifices, but with spiritual worship, with those "spiritual sacrifices, which are acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." (1 Pet. 2:5.) ... Not in types, but according to the truth contained in them; "for the Law was by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." (1:17.) ... We must have just and awful thoughts of the divine majesty, often representing him to our thoughts, as a God of infinite purity and justice, as well as of power and wisdom; one who is always present with, and beholds all our secret thoughts and actions, in order to a future recompense. ... We must endeavour to resemble him, as much as may be, in holiness and righteousness, in truth, in goodness, and in mercy. ... And we must worship God from spiritual principles, a sincere love, and filial reverence of him; and to spiritual ends, that we may promote his glory, and do what is well pleasing in his sight; and after a spiritual manner, serving him with the whole heart, soul, and mind, and with a fervency of spirit.' Whitby. (*Marg. Salvation. (22) Ἡ σωτηρια. "The salvation" predicted, prefigured, and promised, in every part of the sacred Scriptures.

V. 25, 26. The woman did not object to our Lord's words; yet she seems not to have been fully satisfied; and therefore she was disposed to leave the matter undecided, till the advent of the Messiah, who she expected would come, and finally determine all these controversies, and give them more complete instructions. But our Lord, (not having the same reasons for caution as he had among the Jews, who were disposed either to excite insurrections, or to accuse him to the Romans,) without any reserve informed her, that he was indeed the Messiah: and doubtless a power accompanied his words, which enabled her to believe in him, and to understand in some measure the nature of his salvation. (Marg. Ref.)—'Christ, leaving the proud Pharisees, communicates the treasures of everlasting life to a poor sinful woman, and a stranger; refuting the gross errors of the Samaritans, and defending the true service of God, which was delivered to the Jews: but so that he calleth both of them back to himself, as One whom alone all the fathers, and all the ceremonies of the law, did regard.' Beza.—Which is called Christ. (25) This is evidently the evangelist's remark to his readers, who understood Greek and not Hebrew; and not the words of the woman, who doubtless spake in the language of the country, which was Syriac, or a dialect of the Hebrew.

V. 27. The disciples themselves had just before been conversing with the Samaritans, while purchasing provisions; and on other occasions, intercourse of that kind must have taken place between the Jews and Samaritans: but that Jesus should enter into free conversation with a woman, who was an entire stranger, and also a Samaritan, and appear earnest in it, was very wonderful to them. (Luke 7:39.) It is not at all likely, that the mere circumstance of conversing with a woman should exclusively excite this wonder: and as to the absurd and illiberal traditions and maxims of the Rabbies, which some learned men have adduced on this subject; it is manifest that they were wholly disregarded by our Lord, except when he entered his protest against them. The women with whom he conversed in general were Jewesses, and persons well known to him and his disciples: but this woman was a Samaritan, and likewise unknown to them. They had, however, notwithstanding their strong remaining prejudices, too high a veneration for their Lord to ask any questions concerning his motives or intentions.

V. 28—30. In the mean time the woman being greatly affected with what she had heard, and with the discovery of the promised Messiah, left her water-pot, (either through forgetfulness, being full of other thoughts, or because she intended to come again to draw water;) and, hasting to the city, she excited the attention of her neighbours, by calling on them to go with her, and see a most extraordinary Person, who had told her the history of her whole past life. And was "not this the Christ?" Indeed he had told her that he was; but she wished them to go, and judge for themselves. Thus she, who left the town an ignorant, bigoted, and licentious woman, by a miracle of grace returned thither as it were, an evangelist, to preach Christ to her neighbours; who were so impressed by her words, and by the power which attended them, that they went forth in great numbers to meet Jesus. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 16—18. 1:47—51. Note, and P. O. Mark 5:14—20. Note, 1 Cor. 14:20—25, vv. 24,25.)

Water-pot. (28) Ὑδριαν. 2:6,7.—Probably this vessel was used for drawing, as well as carrying the water. Αντλημα, 11.

V. 31—34. In this interval, the disciples were earnest with Jesus, to partake of the provisions which they had brought; but he was so much engaged in the labour of love, that he thought no further of his weariness, hunger or thirst. (Note, 5—9, v. 6.) He therefore told them, that "he had meat to eat that they knew not of:" and when they did not understand his meaning; he added, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." It was the Father's will, that he should labour, preach, work miracles, "fulfil all righteousness," in the midst of difficulties and temptations, and at length "finish his work" on earth, by his sufferings on the cross. This was his "meat:" he had an appetite and a relish for it, and found every part of it a delight and refreshment to his soul, because God was glorified and men were benefited by it. As therefore an opportunity was now afforded him, of being employed in his work, he intimated, that he would postpone eating till afterwards. (*Marg. Ref. V. 35—38. It was indeed about four months to the time of the natural harvest: yet if they looked up and observed the Samaritans coming to hear his doctrine, they would see that the fields were even then white unto a better harvest which he was about to reap, in consequence of the seed he had just sown by conversing with the Samaritan woman. And they ought to consider, that this kind of harvest was far more important than the other: for not only would the laborious reaper be graciously rewarded with eternal life; but they who were converted by his labours would be as "fruit gathered" into the same blessedness: and while many, in one way or other, contributed to the sowing the seed, and gathering in the crop; they would all at last rejoice together in the success. This was the good work, in which he meant to employ them, as well as to labour himself: and in their case the proverb, that "one soweth, and another reapeth," which generally was applicable to times of public calamity, would be happily verified. (Notes, Judg. 6:2,3. Is. 65:21—23. Mic. 6:10—15.) He was about to send them out to preach in his name: and the labours of the ancient prophets, and of John the Baptist, and especially his own ministry, would render their work comparatively easy, and they would be abundantly successful: thus they would "enter into others' labours," and reap the harvest which sprang from what others had sown. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 10:36—38.)—This was accomplished after our Lord's ascension, in the conversion of vast multitudes, both of Jews and Samaritans, by their ministry. The clause, "There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest," seems to have been meant of the fact, and not as a proverb: but how far it may be made use of to settle the chronology, or harmony, of our Lord's life and labours, must be determined by those whose studies have been more immediately directed to that object; which after all seems to be of very subordinate consequence.—'In your common harvest, you usually say, after your seed is sown, four months hence will come the harvest. ... But in this spiritual harvest it is otherwise: for the seed of the word

41 And [x]many more believed, [y]because of his own word;

42 And said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: [z]for we have heard him ourselves, [a]and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

43 ¶ Now [b]after two days, he departed thence, [c]and went into Galilee;

45 Then when he was come into Galilee, [e]the Galileans received him, [f]having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast: [g]for they also went unto the feast.

46 So Jesus came again into [h]Cana of Galilee, where he made the water wine. And there was a certain [i]nobleman, [k]whose son was sick at Capernaum.

47 When [k]he heard that Jesus was come out of Judea into Galilee, he went unto him, and besought him [l]that he would come down and heal his son: for he was at the point of death.

48 Then said Jesus unto him, [m]Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe.

49 The nobleman saith unto him, Sir, [n]come down ere my child die.

50 Jesus saith unto him [o]Go thy way; thy son liveth. And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way.

51 And as he was now going down, his servants met him, and told him, saying, [p]Thy son liveth.

52 Then inquired he of them the hour when he began to amend. And they said unto him, Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him.

53 So the father knew that it was [q]at the same hour in the which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth: [r]and himself believed and his whole house.

54 This is again [s]the second miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

sown in the heart of the woman of Samaria, in your absence, hath made the Samaritans already ripe for the harvest.' Whitby.—Four months. (35) Τετραμηνον. Here only.

V. 39—42. Many of the Samaritans were convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, by what the woman had told them concerning him, in which it is probable many circumstances would be mentioned, illustrative of the subject, which are not adduced in so concise a narrative: (Notes, 16—18,28—30.) and when they had come to him and heard his word, notwithstanding their national and religious prejudices, they invited him to stay a while among them for their further instruction. (Notes, 5—9, v. 9. Matt. 10:5,6. Luke 9:51—56. Acts 1:4—8. 8:5—8.) Accordingly he graciously condescended to abide two days with them, and doubtless showed the evidences of his being the Messiah, and the nature of his kingdom; by means of which many more of them believed, and were fully assured that he was "the Saviour of the world," that is, of all sinners throughout the world, who trust and obey him. This was the more wonderful, as we do not find that Jesus wrought any miracle among them. (Marg. Ref.)—Two days. (40) 'He abode there so long, that he might not contemn persons so desirous to learn of him; and no longer, that he might not neglect the Jews, or seem to prefer the Samaritans before them: and he commanded his apostles, not to go to any city of Samaria, (Matt. 10:5.) because the gospel was first to be preached to the Jews.' Whitby.—The Saviour of the world. 42) (Note, 1 John 4:13—17, v. 14.) 'That is, says Mr. M——, of the Jews; for it is not likely, that the Samaritans thought of the salvation of the Gentiles. But why might they not think so, who knew, "that in the seed of Abraham were the families of the earth to be blessed?" And seeing the Samaritans were not Jews, had they used these words in that restrained sense, they excluded themselves from this salvation. ... "The world" ... never means the Jews in opposition to the Gentiles.' Whitby.

V. 43—45. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 13:54—58, v. 57. Luke 4:16—32, vv. 16,24.) The proverb referred to was a general truth: yet the miracles which Jesus had wrought, and the reputation which he had acquired, at Jerusalem, procured him influence and acceptance, among many of the Galileans who had been at the feast. It is, however, the general opinion, that Nazareth and its neighbourhood are here called "his own country:" and that this is assigned as the reason why he went by another road to Cana, instead of going to Nazareth to reside, or even taking that city in his way; for Cana lay north of Nazareth.

V. 46—54. When our Lord was come again to Cana, the son of a certain "nobleman," or courtier, (Marg.) probably of Herod's court, who was sometimes called king, (Note, Mark 6:14—29, v. 14.) lay dangerously ill at Capernaum, which was at a considerable distance. This courtier, hearing that Jesus was returned, came in person to Cana, and most respectfully entreated him to go with him, and heal his son, who lay at the point of death. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 2 Kings 3:11,12. 5:9—12. Matt. 8:5—9. Luke 7:1—10.) Upon this, our Lord rebuked the unteachableness of his countrymen, and their neglect of spiritual blessings, by observing that they would not believe in him, except they continually witnessed his power in working miracles, and received the temporal benefit of them: whereas the Samaritans had believed his word without any miraculous confirmation of it. This reproof, of the truth and justice of which the courtier was probably convinced, only influenced him more earnestly to entreat Jesus to go with him, "ere his son died:" for he believed he could recover him if upon the spot; though he does not then seem to have conceived, that he could raise him from the dead, or heal him at a distance. But our Lord, in order to prove and increase his faith, ordered him to return home, as "his son lived," or was recovered and out of danger: and though the man had no proof of this but the word of Jesus, and no instance of this kind seems at that time to have occurred, yet he was enabled to believe it. He therefore set off home without hesitation, and being met by his servants, he found from them, that his son was instantaneously relieved from his fever, exactly at the time when Jesus had spoken the word: in consequence of this both the courtier and his family became the avowed disciples of Christ. (Marg. Ref. m—s.) —Some think that this was Chuza, Herod's steward. (Note, Luke, 8:1—3.)—Our Lord had wrought miracles elsewhere, but this was the second performed at Cana, and on his return from Jerusalem. (Note, 2:1—11.)

Nobleman. (46) Βασιλικος, scil. ανηρ. 49. Acts 12:20,21. Jam. 2:8.—A βασιλευς, rex. Some think, that he was a near relation, as well as a courtier of Herod.—He began to amend. (52) Κομψοτερον εσχε. Here only.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. The success of the gospel always exasperates proud unbelievers, especially Pharisees, and formal teachers and rulers in the church, however prudently its ministers behave: but it is best in general not to outbrave, but to give way to, the violence of persecutors, as far as it consists with faithfulness and usefulness.—In all our journeys we should copy our Lord's example: into whatever place we come, we should endeavour to render our presence useful; and we ought always to subordinate our personal accommodations to that superior object. We should frequently meditate on his "weariness," and his painful, exposed, and inconvenient situation, when "he sat thus at the well;" few would be cheerfully satisfied to journey, to rest, and to fare as he did. This consideration may teach the poor, patience and contentment; and the rich, self-denial, simplicity, gratitude, and liberality.—But let us observe where and what the "lost sheep" of Christ are, when he comes "to seek and save" them; and how he meets with them frequently, when they are not at all thinking of him. If we now believe in his name, after a careful review of our own character, thoughts, and plans, when he first began to make himself known to us; we shall, many of us at least, be constrained to confess, that we were as unworthy and unlikely, as much prejudiced against him, and apparently as far out of his way as this poor Samaritan woman was. This illustrates the riches of his grace, and should excite our humble gratitude. (Note, Is. 65:1,2. P. O. 1—10.)—We may also remark, that bigotry and controversy are extremely inimical to piety and charity: they indispose men to communicate good, or to receive it from others: and thus when they should be praying together, or edifying one another, they are separated by strong antipathy. Nay, those who are agreed in the most important matters, and only differ about subordinate points, are often most vehement in their animosity! But, if we "know the gift of God," and the excellency of Christ, we shall ask of him, and he will give us the blessing of salvation. If we are made wise in the things of God, we shall gladly take a hint from a stranger, or one of another sect or sentiment; and they who are like Jesus will readily counsel or help the meanest, the

CHAPTER V.

Jesus goes up to Jerusalem; and at the pool of Bethesda, on the sabbath-day, heals one who had been diseased thirty-eight years; and orders him to carry his bed, 1—9. The Jews demand of the man, who ordered him to carry his bed: Jesus finds him at the temple, and warns him to sin no more; and he informs the Jews that Jesus had healed him, 10—15. They persecute Jesus, 16. He defends himself, asserting his personal and mediatorial dignity and authority, in the most explicit and energetic language, 17—32: appealing to the testimony of John, 33—35; to his own miracles, 36; to the testimony of God by a voice from heaven, 37, 38, and to the Scriptures, 39, 40. He exposes their unbelief, ambition, and ungodliness; and shows, that in disbelieving him, they disbelieved Moses also, 41—47.

AFTER this [a]there was a feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

2 Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market [b]a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches.

3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, [c]of blind, halt, [d]withered, [e]waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then [f]first after the troubling of the water, stepped in, [g]was made whole of whatsoever disease he had.

vilest, or the most prejudiced of mankind.—Blessed be God, for "the wells of salvation" and "the water of life;" and that we are assured that God will "give his Holy Spirit to all who ask him" in the Saviour's name. Indeed men in general do not value these blessings: they thirst only for sensual pleasures, worldly honours, wealth, power, or splendour: and how largely soever they drink of these wasting and polluted streams; they thirst again and are still dissatisfied, and will thirst for ever, without hope or remedy, unless they now drink the waters of life. But happy are they, who are "athirst for the living God," and for his image and favour! (Notes, Ps. 42:1—3. 63:1—4. 84:1,2.) The trifles of this world will no more quiet them, than toys will content a hungry child; they will be importunate in prayer for the blessings which Jesus is exalted to bestow: and the more they perceive that "the well is deep," and that they cannot draw of themselves; the more earnest will they be in beseeching God to assist them by his Holy Spirit. When they experience his holy consolations, their thirst after sinful pleasures abates; the world appears worthless; an abiding change is manifested in their souls; he, who began the good work, maintains it and carries it on; holy desires, purposes, and affections, spring up in the heart; and these are earnests and foretastes of everlasting life, and will terminate and be perfected in it. (P. O. 7:37—53. Rev. 7:9—17.)

V. 16—26. In vain do we enlarge on the comforts, privileges, and security of the new covenant; in vain do we represent the preciousness and love of Christ to the unregenerate, the unhumbled sinner. He can "see no beauty in him," no desirableness in his salvation, no need of it; and he will not apply for the healing of his soul before he feels his sickness, nor for the binding up of his heart, till it is broken by a sense of guilt and danger. (Notes, 3:3—6. Matt. 5:3.) We should therefore lay open the law as "the ministration of condemnation," and endeavour to put men in remembrance of their crimes, that "their mouths may be stopped," and their thoughts turned from other objects to their own hearts and lives. When the word of God is faithfully opened, and skilfully divided, it often reaches the case, as it were, at one stroke; and thus it produces both a conviction of sin in the outward conduct, and a discovery of the evil which lay concealed within. (P. O. 1 Cor. 14:12—25, vv. 24,25.) Indeed the sinner, when thus attacked, often employs every imaginable means to shift off the conviction; and even religious controversy is frequently had recourse to for a plausible evasion. When those subjects are started which are suited immediately to detect men's vanity, sensuality, luxury, avarice, or ambition; they will, as it were, say, 'Come, let us talk of something else. What think you of this or the other doctrine? Of this sect, this book, this sermon, or this preacher?' They appear to be religiously disposed, but it is in order plausibly to escape conviction; and in fact they say, 'any subject but Herodias,' or any thing even about Herodias, except, "it is not lawful for thee to have her." But the wisdom of the minister consists in pursuing the convicted culprits through all these windings; and if they escape one net to lay another for them.—When any one shrinks from the touch, we may be sure there is a sore, and we should take courage to push vigorously our advantages. Indeed it is surprising and lamentable, to observe how the most abandoned persons will dispute about forms and notions.—There is an essential difference between the ordinances of God, and the most specious human inventions: even many called Christians "know not what they worship," or where salvation is to be found: and let it never be lost sight of, that a sinner cannot worship the "only living and true God," with comfort and acceptance, except as in Christ the God of salvation. We must not, however, overvalue external distinctions: as no worshippers can be accepted, who do not "worship God in spirit and truth;" nor indeed could any other be capable of enjoying felicity in him. As "the Father seeketh such to worship him;" let us beseech him to make us such by his new creating grace, and let us willingly become his instruments in endeavouring to increase the number and the zeal of these spiritual worshippers, that we may offer "spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to him through Jesus Christ our Lord:" and, if thus distinguished, let us rejoice and thank our God; for in praising and adoring him we shall find happiness to all eternity!

V. 27—42. Even wise and good men are very incompetent judges of what it becomes the Lord to do: but reverence will impose silence on them, even when perplexed with the greatest difficulties; and they will deeply abhor such blasphemous objections as unbelievers often utter concerning "things which they understand not."—When the heart is much engaged in pursuit of "the Pearl of great price," outward concerns will sometimes be neglected: and when our affections are greatly excited, we shall naturally be led to call on others to seek those blessings, which we see to be valuable beyond all comparison. Thus, the greatest sinners become witnesses for Christ; and from their own experience, they declare his love and truth to all around them. But no trembling sinners can be more earnest to hear the words of life, than some zealous ministers are (and than all ministers should be) to preach them.—When we consider the Lord Jesus counting his rugged path, his hardships, his labours, and his whole work on earth, till he "finished" it on the agonizing cross, (Note, 19:28—30.) as more pleasant to him than his necessary food; and when we remember that his love and zeal are still unabated, while the exercise of them is attended with no suffering or fatigue; we may confidently seek to him for all the blessings of salvation, and expect them from him. But we should also consider him as our example; and in our inferior services and lighter trials, it should be our "meat to do the will of God, and to finish his work." This mind of Christ should be in all his disciples, but in his ministers especially. When the harvest is ripe, the husbandmen endure hardship, heat, thirst, and fatigue, to seize the opportunity of reaping it: and when sinners are disposed to hear the gospel, we should deem the "fields already white for harvest," and disregard personal inconveniences and self-denial, to improve the precious occasion. On the other hand, the husbandman having sown his seed, waits patiently till "the appointed weeks of harvest;" and so should we, when we have sown the good seed of the word, though we do not presently see the fruit of our labours. Indeed comparatively small success will render this the most gainful employment in the world. Every soul converted will be the minister's everlasting crown of rejoicing, and be for ever happy with him. Let us then patiently and cheerfully endure "the heat and burden of the day;" for as prophets, apostles, and martyrs have laboured and suffered in sowing that seed, of which we now reap the blessed harvest without their toil and tribulation; so others may reap the crop with joy, of what we now sow, weeping because perhaps it all seems to be thrown away. Faithful ministers often labour long, and with little encouragement, but the seed is not lost; for others enter into their labours, and gather many souls unto Christ. And in that world, where ambition and envy are no more, they will all unite in rejoicing over that success, to which they have been in different ways instrumental. In the mean time then, let us labour (whether sowing or reaping) in faith, hope, love, and patience.—The chief usefulness of ministers is sometimes found among those who previously bore the worst characters, and were counted the most hopeless persons. Such are often the instruments of exciting others, by carrying a report of what they have heard and experienced; and the effects of "the quick and powerful word" of Christ, in detecting the thoughts and intentions of their hearts, and bringing to remembrance the sins of their past lives, are the general means by which men are brought to believe. Those, however, who hear and receive the word of God, "have the witness in themselves;" and shall know and be assured that "Jesus is the Christ, the Saviour of the world." (Notes, 1 John 5:9—13.)

V. 43—54. Pride, prejudices, and worldly prosperity, concur in keeping men from the Saviour; and those are happy afflictions, personal or domestic, which induce any to inquire after him. Indeed the rich and honourable of the world seldom come to him; till some grievous trial shows them the vanity of their distinctions, and that they need other help than man can give, or wealth can purchase. (P. O. Matt. 9:18—26.) This conviction, and a heart broken for sin, prepare the mind so to see the suitableness of Christ and his salvation to their wants and desires, that signs and wonders are no longer needful, in order to a man's believing and humbly trusting in him. But we must submit to his rebukes, and renew our applications with increasing importunity; we must simply credit his words and follow his directions, if we would have the blessing from him. Then experience will confirm and strengthen our faith; and we shall find that every event exactly accords with his declarations, and that all things in heaven and earth obey him. In this way, the knowledge of Christ spreads through families, and men find health and

5 And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity [b]thirty and eight years.

6 When Jesus saw him lie, [c]and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, [d]Wilt thou be made whole?

7 The impotent man answered him, Sir, [e]I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming another [f]steppeth down [m]before me.

8 Jesus saith unto him, [g]Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.

9 And [h]immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: [i]and on the same day was the sabbath.

10 The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath-day: [k]it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed.

11 He answered them, [l]He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then asked they him, [n]What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed and walk?

13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus [o]had conveyed himself away, [n]a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jesus findeth him [q]in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: [r]sin no more, [s]lest a worse thing come unto thee.

salvation to their souls. These miracles never cease: may we and all ours seek to Jesus, and experience them for our good!

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1. This is generally supposed to have been the feast of the passover: (Marg. Ref.) yet perhaps none of the evangelists mention all the passovers which occurred during our Lord's public ministry. But, subsequent to what was related in the former chapter, several things, recorded by the other evangelists, are supposed to have taken place, before Jesus went up to Jerusalem. He had called several disciples to a stated attendance on him, wrought many miracles, and probably delivered the sermon on the mount. (Notes, Matt. 4:12—25. 5:—7: Luke 4:16—44. 5:1—11.)—[1] He refused not communion with a church which had clogged these festivals with human traditions: though perhaps he performed only the rites required by the law.' Whitby.

V. 2—4. As the evangelist uses the present tense, saying, "There is at Jerusalem, &c." it has been conjectured, that he wrote his gospel before the subversion of that city: but this is not decisive; for the pool might remain, even though the porches were laid in ruins: and the spot on which the city stood was called Jerusalem, long after the temples and buildings were destroyed by Titus; and indeed is so to this day. Thus our Lord says, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." (Luke 21:24.) Many things are recorded, or reported, concerning this pool, which do not appear deserving of credit. It was situated near "the sheep-market," or the sheep-gate, by which great numbers of these animals were driven into the city, to be sold for sacrifices, or for consumption. (Marg. and Ref.) The name "Bethesda," signifies "a house of mercy;" and it seems to have been given it, on account of the miracles there wrought. The "five porches," or porticos, were probably built on the several sides of the pool for the accommodation of those who walked there to recreate themselves, or converse with their friends; but they became at length, in great measure, appropriated to the use of those diseased persons who went thither to be healed. Of these "a great multitude" were collected together; some of them being afflicted or disabled in one way, and some in another. Probably most of them were deemed incurable by ordinary methods; and therefore they were carried thither, to wait and hope for a miraculous recovery. (Marg. Ref. b —e.) For it pleased God (in order to show that he had not forsaken his people, but that he was about to visit them again in mercy,) to send "an angel," from time to time, to excite a visible and extraordinary commotion in the pool: and whenever this took place, it was found by experience, that the person who first bathed in it after the troubling of the water, was perfectly cured, whatever disorder he had been afflicted with: but that others who bathed afterwards obtained no relief.—Some have thought that this effect was produced only once a year, at the feast of the passover; and others, with more probability, that it occurred every sabbath. But if "the troubling of the water" took place so regularly, that the time might be certainly foreknown: it does not appear that the diseased persons would have had any occasion previously to wait by the pool, as it would have sufficed for them to come at the appointed seasons. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—[2] An angel went down at the seasons appointed by God, though not fixed or foreknown by men.' Bp. Hall.—The hypothesis of Dr. Hammond, (though supported by the sanction of some of the ancient fathers,) which supposes, that the washing of the numerous sacrifices and the entrails of them, in this pool, had given it a salutary virtue: and that the angel was no other than a messenger, sent by the priests or rulers, to stir up the water, that this efficacy might be more powerfully exerted; is so unscriptural and so irrational, that it is wonderful it should ever have been thought of a second time, by any one to whose imagination it might once occur. To mention nothing else, what were the brazen sea, and the lavers in the courts of the temple provided for, and always replenished with abundance of water; but that the sacrifices (as well as the priests and Levites) might be washed upon the spot, and not carried out of the holy place, to a distant pool for that purpose?—It is probable, that this miracle was not wrought for any length of time, and perhaps it ceased on this occasion. —[3] This may account for the surprising silence of Josephus in a story which made so much for the honour of his nation. ... He was himself not born when it happened: and though he might have heard the report of it, he would perhaps (in the modern way) oppose speculation and hypothesis to fact. ... Or, if he secretly suspected it to be true, his dread of the marvellous, and fear of disgusting his pagan readers, might as well lead him to suppress this, as to disguise the passage through the Red Sea, and the divine voice from mount Sinai, in so mean and foolish a manner, as it is known he does. And the relation, in which this fact stood to the history of Jesus, would render him peculiarly cautious in touching on it.' Doddridge.—This miraculous effect seems to have been an emblem of the healing of men's souls by the gospel, and by washing in "the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness:" and, compared with the multiplied and continual miracles wrought by our Lord, [4]not at distant periods of time, but every day; who not only performed a single cure, but healed whole multitudes that resorted to him![5] (Doddridge;) it might also denote the efficacy of divine grace under the old dispensation, as distinguished from its more extensive effects under the ordinances of the New Testament.

V. 5—9. Among the numerous pitiable objects found in this place, our Lord was pleased to notice one especially, who had laboured under disease, perhaps the palsy, "for thirty-eight years." Many persons speak as if he had lain by the pool all that time; but that is without foundation, and utterly improbable. When, however, all other means failed, he had been taken thither in hopes of a miraculous cure; and he persevered in waiting, notwithstanding tedious delays and bitter disappointments. This man our Lord selected from the rest, probably because his case was more desperate and lamentable than that of any other even in this recess of misery; for he well knew how long he had been thus afflicted. In order to excite his attention and expectation, he asked him, "Willest," or desirest "thou to be made whole?" a question which in his case might appear unnecessary, but which aptly represented the proposal of the gospel to those whose souls have long been diseased and disabled by sin. The man replied, that being very poor, as well as enfeebled by disease, he had neither friend nor servant to assist him, when the water was troubled; and had hitherto been precluded from a cure, by "another stepping in before him:"—the language of one who nearly despaired of relief. But Jesus at once commanded him to "take up his bed, and walk:" and though his disorder was so inveterate, and of so long continuance, it was instantaneously removed, and he was enabled to carry his bed, as a man in perfect health and vigour. This should be the more generally noticed, and excite the greater surprise and the more inquiries, as it occurred on the sabbath-day, when burdens were not allowed to be carried; by which means the power of Jesus would become more extensively known and attended to. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 12:1—13. Luke 13:10—17.—[7] There is no evil so inveterate that Christ cannot cure it.' Beza.

16 And therefore did the Jews [t]persecute Jesus, [u]and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath-day.

17 But Jesus answered them, [v]My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had [w]broken the sabbath, but said also that [x]God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

19 Then answered Jesus, and said unto them, [y]Verily, verily, I say unto you, [z]The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: [a]for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise.

20 For [b]the Father loveth the Son, [c]and sheweth him all things that himself doeth: and he will show him [d]greater works than these, that ye may marvel.

the Pharisees, scribes, or rulers. They found fault with the man for violating the sabbath-rest by carrying his bed; (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, Neh. 13:15—19. Jer. 17:19—27.) though it was evidently done in honour of God, as manifesting the miraculous cure which had been performed. He therefore replied, that the very person who had made him whole, even he had ordered him to take up his bed and walk. But they, not at all noticing the stupendous miracle, only inquired who ordered him to carry his bed. It is probable that they suspected who it was, and were the more excited to opposition by that circumstance. Our Lord, however, had so speedily and silently withdrawn from the place, where multitudes were assembled, that the man was not able to inform them who his Benefactor was. But soon after, probably on the same day, Jesus met him in the temple, whither he had repaired, no doubt to render thanks for his unexpected cure, and perhaps to offer a sacrifice of praise: and Jesus called his attention to the greatness of the unmerited benefit which he had received, and warned him to "sin no more," lest a still worse evil should befall him. This was an intimation, that his most tedious and painful disease had originated from some youthful irregularities, which were well known to Jesus, though committed before his birth as Man. And it was thus implied, that repentance and its genuine fruits would be the best evidence of the sincerity of the man's gratitude. As he had been grievously afflicted for thirty-eight years, we cannot easily conceive of a worse temporal evil, which could afterwards befall him; but doubtless Christ spake of "the wrath to come," which is indeed infinitely worse. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—y.)

V. 15, 16. When the man had thus discovered to whom he owed his cure; he went and told the Jews, (saying nothing of his having ordered him to carry his bed;) and probably he expected, that they would honour his Benefactor. 'Partly out of gratitude to own the author of his cure; and partly to excuse himself, as only doing this at the command of so great a prophet.' Whitby. But on the contrary the Jews prosecuted Jesus, seeking to put him to death as a sabbath-breaker; and it is likely that he was brought before the Sanhedrim, and spake what follows before that assembly. (Marg. Ref. 33. Note, 1:19—28.) This view of the subject makes the discourse peculiarly interesting, and there is a dignity in it which indeed is inexpressible.

V. 17, 18. In answer to the accusation brought against him, our Lord briefly said, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Thus he called God his Father in a peculiar sense, and claimed the prerogative of acting as God the Father did, without being restricted by rules laid down for his creatures and subjects: for the miracle which had been performed was not wrought by human labour, but by the immediate energy of his divine power. God finished the work of creation in six days, and "rested on the seventh;" (Notes, Gen. 2:2,3. Ex. 20:8—10.) but he incessantly works in upholding the universe, and in continuing the course of nature by his providential superintendence. In this work the Son concurs, by a union of will and operation, "upholding all things by the word of his power." (Note, Heb. 1:3,4.) His work also as Mediator was to be conducted by the same unremitted and uninterrupted action, as that of sustaining the universe: this miracle was a part of the work well suited to the sabbath-day; and he claimed the prerogative of carrying it forward on that day as well as on others, even as the Father conducts his providential operations on every day alike. (Marg. Ref. d.)—Unless we suppose this, or something to this purpose, to have been our Lord's meaning, there could be no argument in his plea: for the example of the Creator in "working hitherto," can be no reason why a creature, a servant, a mere man, should do as he pleased on the sabbath-day: nor did any of the prophets ever advance a claim of that kind. The divine power of the miracle proved Jesus to be "the Son of God;" and he insisted on the prerogative of working with and like unto his Father, as he saw good, without giving any account of his conduct. (Matt. 12: 8.) These ancient enemies of Christ plainly understood him, (though modern opposers of his Deity cannot!) and were thus rendered more violent in their prosecution; not only charging him with sabbath-breaking, but with blasphemy, in calling God his own Father, "and making himself equal with God" in perfection and operation.—'If God my Father, working on the sabbath, doth not violate the sabbath; neither do I, when I work on the sabbath, violate the sabbath. This conclusion cannot stand, unless the quality of the persons of the Father and of the Son be determined. ... "Making himself equal with God." These are the words of the evangelist, not only repeating, but approving, what the Jews rightly collected from the words of Christ.' Beza. 'The whole nation of the Jews thought God their Father; (8:41.) ... and they could not have accounted it blasphemy to have used that phrase, had they not interpreted it in so high and appropriating a sense.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 10:26—39.)

V. 19. In answer to this further charge, Jesus solemnly assured them, that "the Son can do nothing of himself." As the Father and the Son are one in nature and perfections, so they are one in will, counsel, and operation; and it is impossible that the Son can do any thing of himself, apart from what the Father does. But, being intimately acquainted with every thing which the Father does, he co-operates with him in all his works of creation and providence; so that it is equally proper to ascribe them to the Son as to the Father: for the Son not only performs similar works to those of the Father, but the same works, whatever they be. (Marg. Ref. h.)—'Christ did not say, He doeth like unto them; but the same things in like manner.' Beza. Creation, the resurrection of the dead, our Lord's own resurrection, and many other works of omnipotence, are sometimes ascribed to the Father, at others to the Son, at others to the Holy Spirit: this the marginal references fully prove. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, 20—29. 2:18—22. Acts 17:30,31. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 3:17,18, v. 18.) As simply the works of God, they may with equal propriety be ascribed to any one of the three persons in the sacred Trinity: but the expressions, "of himself," "seeth," "showeth," seem to refer to the delegated authority and power of the Son, as Mediator; and his perfect concurrence with the Father, in accomplishing the glorious plan of redemption as to every particular.

These also doeth the Son likewise.] Ταυτα και ὁ υιος ὁμοιως ποιει. "These also the Son doeth in like manner." 'Ομοιως. 'Similiter, simili modo, eodem modo: ab ὁμοιος, par, æqualis.' Schleusner.

V. 20—23. The Father most perfectly "loveth the Son," and communicates in all his counsels with him: so that the Son perceives and fully comprehends all that the Father does, and co-operates in it. Of this the Jews had seen some instances, especially in the exercise of divine power and goodness, by which the impotent person had been healed: but the Father would show his beloved Son "greater works than these," that by the displays of his divine glory, in the miracles wrought by him, they might be astonished, even if they were not induced to believe in him. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, 3:27—36, vv. 35,36.) For as God is able to restore the dead to life, of which some examples were recorded in their Scriptures; so they should see the Son also by his divine power raising the dead, as an emblem of his restoring to spiritual life, whom he pleases of those who are dead in sin. Indeed all things, relative to the government of the church and of the world, to the final judgment, and to the eternal states of men, were "committed to the Son," as the divine Mediator: insomuch that the Father, in person, "judgeth no his judicial authority, he acted, and ever should act, according to the instructions which he had received, with which his own will and wisdom perfectly harmonized; and in none of his actions did he seek his own will, as man; but that of the Father who had sent him, whom he came to glorify, and who was glorified in his glory. (Marg. Ref. Note, 6:36—40.)

V. 31—38. If indeed Jesus had claimed such honours and authority, without any proof, except his own testimony to himself; it might have been allowed, that there would be no sufficient reason to receive that testimony: indeed, his testimony, in that case, must have been, not only invalid, but destitute of truth; for who could be authorized to say such things of himself, without any other proof than his own word? There was however another who bare witness to him, whose witness he supposed they must allow to be true, as he assuredly knew it to be. Some refer this to John's testimony; but it rather means that of the Father by John, and in various other ways. The rulers of the Jews, the very persons here addressed, had indeed sent unto John; and he had testified to Jesus that he was "the Son of God," and "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." (Marg. Ref. l—p. Notes, 1:19—30,30—34, v. 34.) Yet our Lord did not stand in need of man's testimony, though he mentioned it as well worthy of their serious attention; for, while they sought his life, he would use every means to bring them to accept of his salvation, and those means would be effectual to some of them. Probably, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea were present at the time.—John indeed had been "a burning and a shining light;" by his holy life, his flaming zeal, his clear instructions, and his patient labours, he had both burned and shined, to warm as well as illuminate them. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, 1:6—9.) '"He was the lighted and shining lamp." John's ministry was of a peculiar character: he was the single prophet, in whom the old dispensation had its completion, and by whom the new was introduced: ... till our Lord's ministry took place, John may have justly been said to have been the light of that generation.' Campbell.—Indeed for a season the Jews had attended to him, and seemed glad to have so eminent a man of God among them; but they only amused themselves with his instructions, without reducing them to practice; and at last they rejected his testimony concerning Jesus, and forsook his ministry. But a far higher testimony had been borne to him, as "the Son of God," than that of John, who wrought no miracle: for the works the Father had intrusted to him to perform, which he had already begun in the miracles he had wrought, and which he should remain on earth to finish, notwithstanding their purpose of killing him; these powerful, holy, and beneficent works sufficiently attested "that the Father had sent him," and authorized all that he had spoken of his own personal and mediatorial dignity and authority. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 3:1,2. 14:7—14, vv. 10,11. 20:30,31.) Nay, the Father himself had borne witness to him, by a voice from heaven, at his baptism, declaring him to be "his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased." (Note, Matt. 3:16,17.) This was such a witness to him, and attended with such a visible display of the divine presence and glory, as neither they nor any of their nation had ever heard or seen, respecting the most eminent prophets, and indeed the highest that could be imagined; for none could possibly "see the form and hear the voice" of the Father as a witness, in any other or more evident manner. This seems to be an intimation to them, that all the appearances of JEHOVAH to their ancestors, and his speaking to them, ought to be understood of him as "the Son of God;" for none of them had heard the voice and seen the form of the Father at any time. V. 39—44. The Jews supposed that eternal life was revealed to them in their Scriptures: nay, they imagined they had it, as it were, in possession; because they had the word of God in their hands. But Jesus exhorted them to "search those Scriptures," with more exact diligence and attention; as all the types and prophecies were fulfilling in his character, actions, doctrine, and miracles; and as the sacred writings every where testified to him, and fully warranted all which he had spoken of himself, by what they contained respecting the divine dignity and authority of the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. c, e. Notes, Luke 24:25—31,44—49. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10.) Or it may be rendered, "Ye do search the Scriptures." They bestowed pains in examining the Scriptures, especially with reference to the kingdom of the Messiah: yet they were so blinded by prejudice, that they could not discern the clear and express testimony which these bore to him; and therefore, while they expected eternal life, they would not come to him for it, who alone could bestow it upon them. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, 6:28—35,41—46. Matt. 23:37—39.)—He spoke not this, as if he needed their sanction, or could receive honour from their approbation: he desired not human applause or external grandeur; nor could he be rendered more honourable, by having priests, scribes, or rulers for his disciples. But he spake thus plainly to them, because he certainly knew that they had no love to God in their hearts, though they professed to be his zealous worshippers; and this was the real ground of their rejecting and opposing him. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, 2:23—25. 8:41—47. 15:22—25.) He was come among them in his Father's name, acting by his authority, bearing his image, fulfilling his word, and seeking his glory, and his mission was abundantly attested; yet they would not receive him: but when others should come, assuming the character of the Messiah, without any such attestations, but acting of their own mind and for their own glory, they would readily receive and follow them: for such impostors would pay court to the scribes and rulers, or accommodate their conduct and pretensions to their prejudices and ambition. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) Indeed, how was it possible that they could cordially receive his humbling spiritual doctrine, or believe in him as the Messiah, while their hearts were full of pride and vainglory? They were accustomed to flatter and compliment each other, and thus to foster self-admiration and self-importance: and to give reciprocal encouragement to each other's ambition of secular honour, authority and pre-eminence: but they had no real desire of that honour which God alone confers on the humble and lowly in heart, (Marg. Ref. n—p. Note, 12:42,43.) and many of them feared the disgrace of being cast out of the synagogue. How then could they welcome a Messiah, who had no worldly preferments to bestow; whose appearance was as mean as his doctrine was humiliating; and whose sharp rebukes must needs exasperate their haughty and envious minds?—In them

(Note, 1 John 5:11,12.) 'If the Jews did truly think the doctrine of life eternal was contained there, and that they by searching might find it there; it must be to them a sufficient rule of faith: if in this they erred, it behooved Christ to correct in them an error so pernicious.' Whitby. This is worthy the serious consideration of all, whether Papists or Protestants, who oppose the circulation of the Scriptures without note or comment.

V. 45—47. Our Lord concluded by observing, that there was no occasion for him to become the accuser of the unbelieving Jews to his Father; nor indeed was this the end of his coming among them, though he so sharply reproved them to their faces: for they had another accuser, even Moses, in whom they trusted for salvation. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 9:27—34. Jer. 17:5—8. 1 Pet. 1:17—21, v. 21.) Yet his writings, which were full of types, prophecies, and promises of him, would certainly condemn them for rejecting him, as well as for their other sins. Had they really believed the testimony of Moses, they would certainly have welcomed that Prophet of whom Moses wrote; but seeing they treated the predictions of Moses with disregard, and did not really believe them, it would be wonderful indeed, if they had believed in Jesus. (Marg. Ref. s—u. See on Note, 39—44. Note, Deut. 18:15—19.)—'This whole passage is peculiarly suited to show us in what light to consider the writings of Moses and the prophets, or the Old Testament, nearly, if not entirely, as we have it. Our Lord certainly sanctioned the general opinion of the Jews, not only that these books were authentic, or genuine; but also that they were divinely inspired, and as such worthy of the most implicit credence and confidence. And, in particular, he has given his full attestation to the books of Moses, not as compiled from his records, but as written in their present form by Moses himself. Though our Lord spoke thus openly on this occasion; yet his persecutors were so over-awed, that they for the present proceeded no further against him, for "his time was not yet come."—The open and full declaration of our Lord, that the Jewish rulers, who now sat in judgment on him, would be finally condemned for rejecting him; and that Moses himself, in whom they trusted, would be their accuser; is inexpressibly dignified and energetic. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 25:31—33.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. The whole earth appears to a considerate mind as a "Bethesda," a great hospital, full of those whom sin has made miserable, and to whom the compassion of God affords the means of relief and comfort. As therefore "his mercies are over all his works," and even those, who most deserve misery, experience his goodness during their continuance here; the mercy of man should also coincide, and we should endeavour to alleviate the sufferings of the vilest, and to do them whatever good we can. Medicines are created and discovered by our offended God, to relieve the diseases of our bodies, which all originate from sin: and we should attempt to render the poor partakers of this benefit by every means in our power. In this view every hospital or dispensary is a "Bethesda:" and would be more completely deserving of that name, if proper means were diligently employed of doing good to the souls, as well as of healing the bodies, of those who resort to it. Yet alas! how few of those, who in this manner obtain relief, are found in the house of God, "offering the sacrifice of thanksgiving" to their great Physician! How few of them live thenceforth to his glory! How few take warning to "sin no more, lest a worse thing should come unto them!" (Notes, Ps. 107:17—22,31,32. P. O. 1—22. P. O. Luke 17:11—19.) But the place, where the gospel is preached and divine ordinances are administered, is the true "Bethesda:" thither the poor and helpless should repair; and hope and wait for a cure, whatever their spiritual maladies be, or however inveterate they have become. Though the multiplied miracles of converting grace, which better ages witnessed, are not generally vouchsafed among us; yet we still see instances of such as, by washing in "the Fountain which God hath opened," are made whole of their most desperate maladies. All the power indeed is of God: yet those who would have the benefit must be watchful, earnest, and patient: (Note, Luke 13:22—30, v. 24) they must not be supine nor dilatory, but make haste to wash and be clean; and then they should endeavour in their turn to assist others also. Yet, if any seem to meet with reiterated disappointments, they should still wait, hope, and seek; not neglecting the means of grace, or ceasing to labour and pray for the blessing: for sometimes they, whose case seems most hopeless, and who are ready to give up all for lost, are made partakers of mercy, peace, and spiritual health, when they least expect them.—The Saviour perfectly knows both how long men have been contracting habits of sin, and how long seeking the help and "joy of his salvation:" and he continually attends in his houses of mercy, to inquire of sinners whether they will be made whole. Yet it is a common case for men to go thither, who are in love with their disease, and only desire to excuse the loathsomeness of it! But if we earnestly desire to be healed and saved in his way, we shall certainly at length obtain that blessing.—When he speaks, power attends his word: and the ability of believers to perform such duties as are impracticable to others, and once were so to them, will best evidence their cure, and recommend their Physician. (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8.) Though scribes and Pharisees object and revile; yet redeemed sinners must obey and honour their Benefactor, and follow the directions of him who has restored health to their souls. By attending on the ordinances of God, they obtain further acquaintance with him; but without deliverance from the love, power, and allowed practice of known sin, there can be no well-grounded hopes of escaping "the wrath to come."—Even in this life, how many hours, days, weeks, months, nay years of pain, do some wicked men endure, through their momentary unlawful indulgences! And if such afflictions are heavy and tedious, whilst year after year men are confined to their beds, and made a burden to themselves and others; how dreadful beyond all conception will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked!

V. 15—29. We are still called to trust in him, whom Pharisees and infidels despise. "As the Father worketh hitherto," so does his co-equal Son, especially in carrying on and sustaining his new creation. May those declarations of his eternal power and Godhead, which enrage his enemies, fill our hearts with humble confidence and admiring gratitude! Nor ought we at all to regard those who accuse us of giving the glory of God to another: such objectors do not understand "the mystery of the Father and of the Son:" or perceive that a union of essence, will, and operation, renders it for ever impossible, to honour the one without honouring the other also.—The eternal Son is the adequate and infinite Object of the Father's love: he possesses all his perfections, and performs all his works, he creates or destroys, he raises from the dead and "quickens whom he will:" "our life is hid in him;" our future judgment is committed to him; and, as dwelling in human nature, he exercises all power and authority throughout the universe, that "all men might honour him, even as they honour the Father." Unless therefore we can honour the Father too much, we need not fear honouring the Son more than we ought. Here is no danger of excess, but much of defect: all the adoration and worship, rendered to the Son, is directed to the glory of God the Father; (Note, Phil. 2:8—11.) and they "who honour not the Son" will be condemned, as enemies and despisers of the Father who sent him. May we then hear his voice, and believe his testimony, as he reveals God to man, and invites us to "come to him, and learn of him, and take his yoke upon us," with promises, that in this way "he will give us rest," even "rest for our souls." (Notes, Matt. 11:25—30.) Thus "our faith and hope will be in God;" we shall "have everlasting life, and not come into condemnation;" for in so doing we shall "pass from death to life." And may his voice reach the hearts of those who are dead in sin, that they may arise from the dead, "repent, and do works meet for repentance;" and thus prepare for the solemn day of retribution! For the hour will soon arrive, "in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation." May we now live, as those who desire and hope then to be found "a people prepared for the LORD!"

V. 30—38. Let none treat the things above stated as assertions, or conjectures, or uncertain speculations: for they are authenticated by the most unanswerable divine testimonies; and they are published, that sinners may hear and fear, believe, and be saved. To the blessed Redeemer all the servants of God bear witness; but he cannot derive from them any addition to his essential glory. "From his fulness they have all received:" (Note, 1:16.) if they be "burning

CHAPTER VI.

Jesus feeds five thousand men, with five loaves and two fishes, 1—14. He withdraws from the multitudes, who purpose to make him King, 15. His disciples put to sea without him, and meet with a storm; but he comes to them walking on the sea, 16—21. Being followed to Capernaum by multitudes, he reproves their carnal motives even in their diligence about religion; and requires faith in him, 22—29. They demand a sign, like that of the manna; and he speaks copiously of himself as the bread of life, and of living by faith in him, 30—39. Many are offended, and forsake him, 60—66. Peter, in the name of the twelve, professes steadfast faith in him, as "the Son of God;" but Jesus pronounces one of them to be a devil, 67—71.

AFTER [a]these things Jesus went over [b]the sea of Galilee, [c]which is the sea of Tiberias.

2 And [d]a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased.

3 And [e]Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples.

4 And [f]the passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh.

5 When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and [g]saw a great company come unto him, he saith unto Philip, [h]Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?

6 (And this he said to [i]prove him: for he himself knew what he would do.)

7 Philip answered him, [k]Two hundred [l]pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little.

8 One of his disciples, [m]Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him, 9 There is a lad here, [n]which hath five [o]barley-loaves, and two small fishes: [p]but what are they among so many?

10 And Jesus said, [q]Make the men sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. So the men sat down, in number about five thousand.

11 And Jesus took the loaves; and [r]when he had given thanks, he distributed to the disciples, and the disciples to them that were set down; and likewise of the fishes as much as they would.

12 When [s]they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, [t]that nothing be lost.

13 Therefore they gathered them together, [u]and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley-loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten.

14 Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, [x]This is of a truth that Prophet that should come into the world.

15 When Jesus therefore [y]perceived that they would come, and [z]take him by force to make him a King, [a]he departed again into a mountain himself alone.

16 And when even was now come, his disciples went down unto the sea,

17 And entered into a ship, [b]and went over the sea toward Capernaum: and it was now dark, and Jesus was not come to them.

18 And [c]the sea arose, by reason of a great wind that blew.

19 So when they [d]had rowed about five and twenty or thirty [e]furlongs, they see Jesus [f]walking on the sea, and drawing nigh unto the ship: and they were afraid.

20 But he saith unto them, [g]It is I; be not afraid.

21 Then [h]they willingly received him into the ship: and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. [Practical Observations.] and shining lights," they glow with his love, and shine by his splendour: he honours them, and they reflect a little of his glory.—Many are willing to hear teachers who are entitled to this character; and are pleased with their gifts or doctrine; but they do not obey the word, "they have no root in themselves, and so in time of temptation they fall away." Not only the works which Christ finished on earth bore witness to him, as the Son of God; but those also that he has wrought since his ascension into heaven, in the promulgation and success of the gospel, demonstrate the same truths: and the voice of God, accompanied by the power of the Holy Ghost, and made effectual to the conversion of sinners, still proclaims, that this is "the beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased," and that all who would be saved must hear and obey him, as the sole "author of eternal salvation."

V. 39—47. When the hearts of men are occupied by pride, ambition, and the love of the world, there is no room for the word of God to abide in them.—Thus many profess to believe, that "in the Scriptures they have eternal life;" yet they bestow little pains to understand these sacred oracles: others search them with a proud, curious, or prejudiced mind, and so cannot see that they "testify of Christ:" others admit this as a doctrine, yet they "are not willing to come to him, that they may have life." Being destitute of the love of God, they are careless about spiritual and eternal blessings; or they imagine they shall be able to obtain them in some other way; or they are proud of their knowledge; they "seek honour one of another;" and they are glad to follow carnal, self-sufficient teachers, who come in their own name, who coincide with their views, flatter their pride, connive at their sins, and seek their own ends by so doing. Alas! how many trust in their attachment to some form of doctrine, or to some renowned head of a party; who no more enter into the real meaning of those doctrines, or into the views of the persons whose names they bear, than the Jews believed the words of Moses, or entered into his views of the prefigured and predicted Messiah. Thus the creeds and formularies of many sects and establishments will suffice for the condemnation of immense multitudes, who glory in belonging to them, as members, as ministers, nay, as rulers! and it is well, if the sermons many preach, and the books which they publish, do not appear in judgment against them, to accuse them of not believing or practising what they preached or printed. Let us then most diligently search and fervently pray over the Scriptures, as men intent on finding eternal life; let us observe that Christ is the grand subject of them, and daily apply to him for that life which he bestows: let us seek "that honour, which cometh from God only," and "not fear the reproach of men:" and thus "by patient continuance in well-doing, let us seek for glory, honour," and immortal felicity. (Notes, Prov. 2:1—9. Rom. 2:7—11.)

(15) The multitudes expected that the Messiah would be a Prophet, as well as a King: they had a temporary conviction, from the miracle which Jesus had wrought, that he was the Messiah: they concluded that the greatest advantages might be expected under a leader, who was able in this manner to provide food for his adherents: and they probably imagined that he would not be displeased to have a kind of constraint laid upon him, to declare himself the expected King of Israel. In these designs the apostles perhaps were ready to concur, by reason of their remaining ambition and worldly prejudices.—The language of the sacred writer in the twenty-first verse, implies that the immediate transition of the vessel to the intended harbour was miraculous.—The geography of these regions at that time is so imperfectly known, that several things relative to it, must be left in a measure of obscurity, amidst the discordant opinions of learned writers.

22 ¶ The day following, when the people, which stood on the other side of the sea, saw that there was none other boat there, save that one whereinto his disciples were entered, and that Jesus went not with his disciples into the boat, but that his disciples were gone away alone;

23 (Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks:)

24 When the people therefore saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus.

25 And when they had found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither?

26 Jesus answered them, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled.

27 Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed.

28 Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God?

29 Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent. [Practical Observations.]

30 They said therefore unto him, What sign showest thou then, that we may see, and believe thee? what dost thou work?

31 Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat.

32 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true Bread from heaven.

33 For the Bread of God is he, which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world.

34 Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread.

ceived. (21) Ἤθελον ... λαβεῖν. "They were willing to receive him." 5:40. 7:17.

V. 22—27. Jesus had dismissed the multitudes, before he "went up to the mountain to pray:" but it seems many continued near the place, or returned thither in the morning in expectation of seeing him again: for they had observed that the "disciples went away alone," in the only vessel which was there at that time. Before the next morning, however, several boats came thither: and when the people could not find Jesus, they concluded that by some means he had followed the disciples. They therefore immediately crossed the lake, and resorted to Capernaum to seek for him: and when they found him in the synagogue (59) they expressed their surprise, inquiring of him by what means he had come thither. (Marg. Ref. i—p.) But instead of resolving their question, he began to blame them for their motives in seeking him. This they did, not because his miracles having convinced them that he was a divine Teacher of righteousness they were earnest in seeking instruction in the truths and will of God; but because, having "eaten of the loaves" and fishes, they wanted to make him a King, in order that they might derive secular advantages from him. (Marg. Ref. r.) He therefore warned them, not to "labour for the meat that perisheth, but for that, &c." All temporal interests of whatever sort were intended, which only afford a transient support or satisfaction, and will soon perish; so that the possessors will be no better for them. They are of a fluctuating, perishing nature, and are often torn away during life: and if this be not the case, death soon removes men from them, to be without them for ever. The earnestness and diligence of men therefore should not be directed to the acquisition of them; except in complete subordination to things spiritual and eternal, and according to the rules of the sacred Scripture. Moderate attention and industry are every man's duty, and a part of true religion, when employed for the Lord's sake, to his glory, in submission to his will and dependence on his blessing, and in entire subserviency to eternal things; and not out of covetousness, ambition, or any carnal principle. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, and P. O. Matt. 6:19—34. Col. 3:1—4.) To obtain and possess the assurance of heaven, to enjoy communion with God, to glorify him, to adorn the gospel and do good, are the Christian's motives to activity, the objects at which he aims: not the desire of growing rich, of aggrandizing a family, of living luxuriously, elegantly, or splendidly, or of being applauded or ennobled.—Instead of "labouring for the meat that perisheth," our Lord exhorted his followers to "labour for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life;" or for all those spiritual blessings which relate to the salvation of the soul. These are of an enduring and incorruptible nature, and terminate in eternal happiness.—The greatest application of mind, the utmost earnestness and assiduity in the use of every appointed means, ought to be employed in seeking these important benefits: yet the idea of merit must be entirely excluded; and men should labour for them, as the "gift of the Son of Man," the incarnate Redeemer, to all true believers: for him God the Father has constituted the absolute Dispenser of these spiritual provisions; and he has sealed his commission, and attested his character, by the miracles which he wrought, and by the other testimonies which he bore to him. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, 5:31—44.) These were the advantages which the Jews should have laboured for, and expected from their Messiah, and not secular honours and emoluments.—"For him hath the Father sealed, even God." The sentence is complete without the word "God," which is added at the end, as explanatory of the preceding clause.

The introduction of this circumstance, in the connexion in which it is here placed, shows that it was thought a more important part of the transaction, by the Evangelist, than it generally is by his readers.—Labour. (27) Ἐργάζεσθε. "Work." Marg. 28,30. 3:21. 5:17. Matt. 24:28, et al.—Sealed.] Ἐσφράγισεν. See on 3:33.

V. 28, 29. When the people heard our Lord exhort them "to labour," or to work, "for the meat, which endureth unto everlasting life;" (27) they inquired what they ought to do, that they might "work the works," which God required of them. They seem to have thought of such works as the Pharisees imposed on their disciples, in addition to the law of Moses. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, 3:1,2. Matt. 19:16—22. Luke 10:25—29.)—To this our Lord answered, that the work especially required of them, was to "believe on him whom the Father had sent" among them. This may be called the first and great commandment of the gospel to sinners. (Marg. Ref. z. Matt. 17:5.) The contrariety of genuine faith in the divine Saviour, to the natural pride, self-confidence, self-will, and carnal enmity against God, of fallen man, renders it extremely difficult; and, like obedience to the law, it cannot be exercised without the preventing and assisting grace of God. Much pains must generally be taken in self-examination, and comparing a man's conduct and character with the rule of duty, and his obligations to obedience; in opposing the pride and lusts of his heart; in separating from evil companions and counsellors, and vain pursuits; in redeeming time for religious purposes, and breaking off bad habits, and in using the means of grace; in complying with the call of the gospel, and in "living the life of faith in the Son of God;" so that it may well be called "a work." The submission of the understanding to the teaching of God, of the conscience to his righteousness, and of the heart and will to his method of salvation and to his authority, which are implied in it, render it emphatically an act of obedience. It honours God in all his perfections, more than any other good work can do: and though it does not justify as a good work, but by receiving Christ for our righteousness; yet without it no other good work can be accepted. So that faith in Christ may especially be called "the work of God;" and it was that act of obedience, to which the Jews were then called, in order to obtain the blessing of eternal life. (Notes, Matt. 7:13,14,24—27. Luke 13:22—30, v. 24.)—'They who seek to please God without faith, are diligent to no purpose. ... Should any one apply to a physician, and ask him for what sum of money he would undertake to cure him, and the physician should answer in these words: All the money which I require is, that thou wilt confide in me, and be fully assured, that I seek nothing but thy recovery and established health: ... who would, from such an answer, conclude, that this confidence was in fact money, which the physician demanded from the sick man, that he might follow his salutary counsels? ... They are therefore, evidently ridiculous, who from this passage infer that faith is a work, and that ... we are justified by our works.' Beza. (Notes, Matt. 11:28—30. Heb. 5:7—10, v. 9. 11:4—10. 1 John 3:18—24, v. 23.)

V. 30—35. When the Jews imagined that Jesus was about to lead them forth to liberty, victory, and dominion, they were ready to avow themselves his followers: and thought his miracles a sufficient proof that he was the Messiah. (14)

35 And Jesus said unto them, [l]I am the [m]Bread of life: [k]he that cometh to me shall [l]never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.

[Practical Observations.]

36 But I said unto you, [m]that ye also have seen me, and believe not.

37 All [n]that the Father giveth me [o]shall come to me: and him that cometh to me [p]I will in no wise [q]cast out.

38 For [q]I came down from heaven, [r]not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.

39 And [s]this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath [t]given me [u]I should lose nothing, [x]but should raise it up again at the last day.

40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one, which [y]seeth the Son, [z]and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day.

But when he demanded faith in him, in order to the attainment of "eternal life;" they perceived that his doctrine did not accord with their worldly expectations, their strong attachment to the Mosaic law, the glosses of the scribes, and traditions of the elders, which indeed made the law itself of none effect; they therefore began to question his divine mission. Some at least demanded, what sufficient evidence he could produce, to convince them that eternal life might be obtained by faith in him; which they seem to have justly considered as a claim to a confidence and dependence unprecedented, and never required by any ancient prophet, or servant of God. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Matt. 12:38—40. 16:1—4.) He had indeed once fed a few thousands with barley-bread and fishes, in a miraculous manner; but what was that in comparison to the wonders performed in the days of their great lawgiver, when two millions of their forefathers had been fed with manna, for the space of forty years; which, both in respect of its excellency, and the manner in which it was given them, might be called "the bread which God gave them from heaven to eat?" (Marg. Ref. c, d.) To this our Lord replied with his usual strong affirmation, that "Moses had not given them that bread;" he had used no means to obtain it for them, much less did he create it; nor did it really come "from heaven," but merely from the upper region of the air. Whereas God, even his Father, who gave their ancestors that typical bread for the temporary sustenance of their natural lives, now gave them "the true Bread" from the heaven of heavens, for the eternal salvation of their souls: for "the Bread of God," emphatically so called, was that which descended from heaven, to give life, spiritual and eternal, to perishing sinners all over the world. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 47—58. 3:12,13.)—It is plain that the Jews did not understand the meaning of our Lord: yet many of them had much reverence for him, and supposed that he alluded to some unknown benefit, which he meant to confer on them; and therefore they seriously, though ignorantly, desired him to "give them evermore that bread" of which he spoke: for the address is such, that we cannot understand it as used in a deriding manner. (Note, 4:10—15, v. 15.) Jesus therefore more explicitly declared, that by "the Bread of life," he meant himself: and that, by "coming to him," and "believing on him," they might receive and be sustained by that Bread unto everlasting life.—In his person, atonement, and mediation, he is the suitable and sufficient Sustenance of our souls. The sinner, who in true faith, receiving the sure testimony of God, applies to him, and relies on him, for pardon, grace, comfort, and all things pertaining to eternal life, finds his wants supplied, and his desires satisfied in an adequate manner: so that he shall never be tortured through hunger and thirst, without having a supply ever ready at hand to relieve and remove them. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 4:10—15, vv. 13,14. 5:24—27, v. 24. 1 John 5:11,12.)—We may here observe that "coming to Christ," and "believing on him," signify the same in scriptural language; or rather the former is the never-failing consequence of the latter. (Note, 1:10—13.)—'Our Lord so much insists upon this metaphor, because it was familiar to the Jews, and used by their most celebrated writers.' Whitby. Surely, this was neither his only nor his principal reason; for had it not been a metaphor well adapted to convey his meaning, he would have rejected it, and substituted one more apposite.—'It is very usual with the sacred writers to represent divine instructions, as the food of the soul; (Ps. 19:10. 119:103. Prov. 9:5. Job 23:12. Jer. 15:16. Heb. 5:12,14.) yet I can recollect no instance in which the instructer himself, as such, is called food, or any are said to eat him; much less, in which, as below, they are exnorted to "eat his flesh and drink his blood." So that Dr. Clarke's laboured and ingenious criticism on this passage, is far from being satisfactory; and, however clear it may be of any such design, I fear it has misled many to a neglect of that great doctrine, the atonement of Christ, to which there seems in the context so express a reference.' Doddridge.—The whole of this discourse has such an inseparable connexion with the real atonement of our Lord's death on the cross, and the life of faith in him and in that atonement; that, if these subjects be kept out of sight, it is impossible to give any clear and satisfactory exposition of the passage. And this is a most conclusive proof of these doctrines, to all who revere the words of Christ; according to that form of reasoning, which is called reductio ad absurdum,—'reducing an opponent to an absurdity, to escape the conclusive force of an argument.—As it is written, &c. (31) Neh. 9:15. Ps. 78:24. The variation from the Septuagint, in either place, is immaterial Shall never hunger. (35) Ου μη πεινασῃ.—Shall never thirst.] Ου μη διψησῃ πωποτε.—See on 4:14.

V. 36—40. Our Lord next plainly told the Jews, that though they had seen him and his miracles, and seemed to be his zealous followers, yet they did not truly believe in him. But if they forsook him, he should not be without disciples; for all "whom the Father had given him," in his foreknowledge and choice of them, and by the covenant of redemption made with him as their Surety, would "come to him." The event is certain, "they will come," but without any compulsion; for the discovery of their guilt, danger, and remedy, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, makes them most willing and glad to come, and to renounce every hope and interest which interferes with seeking to him for salvation. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, 16:8—15. Ps. 110:3.)—At the same time this purpose and work of God perfectly consisted with the general encouragements which he gave to all who desired to come and share these blessings; as it was equally true, that he "would in no wise cast out" one individual who thus came to him; either at first refusing to admit him into the number of his people, or afterwards casting him out, as Hagar and Ishmael were cast out of Abraham's family. (Note, Gal. 4:21—31.) This implies a promise or engagement of Christ, that no degree of previous guilt, no inveterate habits of vice, no slavery to Satan, no secret decree of God, no involuntary mistake, no feebleness in attempting to come to him, would induce him to reject a single person, who applied to him for the salvation of his soul, with a sincere desire of that blessing, and a believing dependence on his truth, power, and grace, by using diligently and with perseverance the means which he has appointed. In this, the Father's will, which the Son came down from heaven to perform, perfectly concurs: it is his will, that not one of those "given to the Son" should be rejected or lost by him, in life or death; but that every one of them should be raised up, to eternal felicity, "at the last day." And it is equally his will, that every one, "who beholdeth the Son," who so contemplates his character and work, and discerns the glory and suitableness of his salvation, as to believe in him, and to intrust his soul in his hands, should have everlasting life, notwithstanding all possible hinderances and objections. (Marg. Ref. p—z. Notes, 41—46, vv. 44, 45. 60—65, v 65. 10:26—31, vv. 28,29. 17:11,12. Ps. 40:6—8. Heb. 10:5—10.)—These two views of the divine will, his secret will concerning those whom he has "chosen to salvation," and his revealed will concerning the actual salvation of every believer, are perfectly coincident; for no one wills thus to come, till divine grace has subdued, and in part changed, his heart, and therefore no one who comes will ever be cast out. When an awakened sinner is willing to come to Christ, if he finds the doctrines of the divine decrees too dazzling for his feeble eyes, he should look off from them to the general invitations and promises of the gospel: but when he can bear to look at the former, he may find in them the source and reason of his willingness, and be encouraged to hope for the completion of that work which grace has begun in his soul.—But let every one beware of blaspheming or perverting these doctrines, which are so evidently contained in Scripture; and which indeed cannot be separated from our ideas of the divine sovereignty and perfections, or from a proper understanding of the entirely free grace of God, in the salvation of his people from their state of sin and death, by regeneration, conversion, faith, justification by grace, and adoption into the family of God.—Giveth, &c. (37) This expression is used by none but our Lord himself, and only in this chapter, (39) in the twenty-ninth verse of the tenth chapter, and in the seventeenth chapter of this gospel; so that any diligent inquirer, by comparing the several verses in which it is found, may form a judgment of its real import.—'All that the Father has graciously chosen to himself, and whom he giveth to me in consequence of a peculiar covenant, to be sanctified and saved by me, will certainly at length come unto me. I have given that sense of this important text, which on serious and I hope impartial consideration, appeared to me most agreeable to the words themselves, and to the general tenor of Scripture. Mr. Le Clerc's gloss upon them appears to me

41 ¶ The Jews then [a]murmured at him, because he said [b]I am the Bread which came down from heaven.

42 And they said, [c]Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph whose father and mother we know? how is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?

43 Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, [d]Murmur not among yourselves.

44 No [e]man can come to me, [f]except the Father which hath sent me [g]draw him: [h]and I will raise him up at the last day.

45 It is [i]written in the prophets, [k]And they shall be all taught of God. [l]Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me.

46 Not that [m]any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God; [n]he hath seen the Father.

[Practical Observations.]

47 Verily, verily, I say unto you, [o]He that believeth on me hath everlasting life.

48 I am [p]that Bread of life.

49 Your [q]fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, [r]and are dead.

50 This is [s]the Bread which cometh down from heaven, [t]that a man may eat thereof, and not die.

51 I am the [u]living Bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this Bread, he shall live for ever: and the Bread that I will give is [x]my flesh, which I will give for [y]the life of the world.

52 The Jews therefore [z]strove among themselves, saying, [a]How can this man give us his flesh to eat?

unnatural, and Dr. Whitby's frivolous.' Doddridge.—I own myself perfectly unable to understand what the latter writer means, in his long note on this text; unless it be, that all who believe in Christ will come to him; i. e. all who come, will come!—'Envy keeps some, covetousness others, and love of the praise of men keeps others, from believing. And generally the unbelieving heart is an evil heart, and a reprobate mind, and a hard heart, and a foolish and slow heart. ... Meanwhile the better dispositions and preparations of the hearts of these here, are to be looked upon, as effects wrought by the preventing grace of God, and in that respect they are said to be drawn by the Father.' Hammond. (Note, 41—46.) It is not meant that this learned divine maintains the same views with the author. It is well known, that he contends earnestly for the contrary system. Yet he has here, without perhaps being aware of it, expressed himself in language, suited to the views of all sober Calvinists; and has made a concession of too much importance to be passed over in the argument; a concession, which it will be difficult for any man to prove either unscriptural or irrational.—'From the gratuitous election in Christ, by the Father, flows the gift of faith, which eternal life necessarily follows. Therefore faith in Christ is a certain testimony of our election, and consequently of our future glorification.' Beza.

V. 41—46. The foregoing declarations of Jesus excited the murmurs, and offended the prejudices of those who heard them; especially his saying, "I am the Bread which came down from heaven." (33) Being ignorant of his miraculous conception, they supposed that they were acquainted with his parents; and they thought that he was a mere man born on earth, as other men are: how then could he say, "I came down from heaven?" (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 7:40—53, vv. 41—43. Matt. 13:54—58. Mark 6:1—4. Luke 4:20—22.) Yet had not our Lord pre-existed in heaven before his nativity, even his miraculous conception would not have removed or answered the objection, "How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven?" (Notes, 3:12,13. 16:25—30. Eph. 4:7—10.) But Jesus required them to suppress their murmurs, and secret whisperings of dissatisfaction; for he must assure them, that "no man can come to him, except the Father draw him." The ground of this impossibility lies in the contrariety which subsists between the proud, worldly, unholy, rebellious, and ungodly nature of fallen man; and the humbling, spiritual, and holy nature of the gospel. This cannot be taken away, except by the energy of divine grace in regeneration. (Notes, 1:10—13, v. 13. 3:3—6.) The Father "who sent the Son into the world to save sinners," must draw them to the Son to be saved by him, or they will universally neglect his salvation. The gospel finds none willing to be saved from sin and condemnation, in the humbling holy manner revealed in it: none are saved against their will; but the Lord, by his grace, disposes and draws sinners to Christ, and his drawing is the first moving cause of their activity and diligence. (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) He cures as it were the fever of the soul; he creates the appetite; he sets the provisions before the sinner; he convinces him that they are wholesome and pleasant, and that he is welcome; and thus the man is drawn to come, and eat, and live for ever. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, 60—65. 12:27—33, v. 32. Judg. 4:6,7. Cant. 1:4. Hos. 11:3,4.)—Our Lord next reminded his hearers that this accorded with the doctrine of their prophets, who had declared, that all who received the benefit of the Messiah's kingdom, would be "taught of God." Thus, in fact, every man, in all ages and places, who "has learned of the Father" (by hearing and believing his word,) those truths which he teaches concerning his own perfections, his law, the future judgment, the eternal world, the evil of sin, the ruined estate of man, his need of mercy and grace, and the nature and glory of salvation, is infallibly brought to believe in Christ, and count all things but loss in comparison of him; and all who truly believe in him, are thus taught by God himself. The Jews, however, must not hence conclude, that the Father would teach them personally: for none had seen the Father, except his beloved Son, who was of him, and perfectly acquainted with him: they must, therefore, expect to be taught by his inward influence upon their minds, removing their prejudices, and humbling their pride; by means of his word, and of those ministers whom he sent among them. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 1:18. Matt. 11:27.)—Draw. (44) 'That is, as Augustin righly teacheth, whom he shall of unwilling render willing. For it is indeed true, that no one believes against his will: ... but we are willing, because it is given us that we should be willing. For it is not from man willing, but from God pitying.' Beza.—Taught, &c. (45) The texts referred to, (for it cannot be called a quotation,) indisputably relate, not to all the Jews, as some suppose; but to the true Israel, that holy church, of which Israel as a nation was a type. It is the new covenant, of which Christ is the Surety, (and not the old covenant made with Israel at Sinai,) which engages for this divine teaching, to all those for whose benefit it was formed. V. 47—51. After a repeated and most solemn assurance, that faith in him was the only and the certain method of obtaining everlasting life, and that he was "the Bread of life;" our Lord showed the Jews the superior excellence of his salvation above the manna, which was but a shadow of so great a blessing. Their fathers had eaten manna in the wilderness, and most of them had died, without entering the promised land, and the rest of them had lived but a short time afterwards: so that the advantage of that food was very small, save to those who saw in it the type of good things to come. (Marg. Ref. o, r. Notes, 30—35. 5:24—27, v. 24. P. O. Ex. 16:22—36. 17:1—7. Note, 1 Cor. 10:1—5.) But the true "living Bread which came down from heaven," is of so excellent a nature, that the man who feeds on it shall never die: his soul will be nourished by it to everlasting life; and the death of the body will be only a sleep, which will shortly terminate in a glorious resurrection. And this Bread is no other than the flesh of Christ; his human nature which he had assumed into personal union with his Deity, that he might present it to the Father as an expiatory sacrifice for the sins of the world; to redeem sinners of every nation who believe in him, and to obtain for them "all things pertaining to life and godliness." (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, 52—58. 4:10—15.)—'The Jews had insinuated, that feeding a few thousands with the five loaves was an inconsiderable thing, when compared with what Moses did, when he fed the whole camp of Israel: but our Lord here declares the purposes of his grace and bounty to be far more extensive, as reaching to the whole world, and giving life, immortal life, to all that should believe in him.' Doddridge.

Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.

54 Whoso [e]eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, [f]hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day.

55 For my flesh is [g]meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed.

56 He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, [h]dwelleth in me, and I in him.

57 As [i]the living Father hath sent me, and [k]I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, [l]even he shall live by me.

58 This is [m]that Bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever.

V. 52—58. The Jews, who were generally ignorant, carnal, and formal, not understanding these declarations, began to dispute among themselves about them. Some took them in one sense, some in another: and probably many derided or censured Jesus, while others vindicated him: yet none of them could conceive how he could "give them his flesh to eat." (Marg. Ref. 2, a. Note, 3:4,5.) But he assured them, in the most decisive manner, that "Except they ate his flesh and drank his blood, they had not life" (or eternal life) "in them;" but continued dead in sin and under condemnation.—It is here requisite to explain more fully the instruction conveyed by this figurative language. The human nature of "the Word, who was made flesh," was doubtless intended; (Note, 1:14.) his "flesh and blood" became "meat and drink," when he gave his body to be wounded, and his blood to be shed on the cross for our sins; and when his soul was made a sacrifice to the divine justice. "The flesh and blood" of Christ, as separated by death, procured salvation for sinners; and the expressions here employed refer to the intention, efficacy, and benefits of the sufferings of Christ. These are as needful to the life and health of our souls, in our ruined state, as meat and drink are to the life and health of our bodies. The Lord, who, knowing our outward wants, has provided food for our use, in compassion to our perishing misery as sinners, has also appointed this nourishment for our souls. Our food does not sustain us by being prepared; but by being received, digested, and incorporated: so Christ does not give life to our souls, merely by dying for us, or by being exhibited in the gospel; but, as received through faith, digested as it were in humble meditation, and converted into nutriment, to hope, love, and other holy affections.—The healthy man hungers and thirsts: nothing but meat and drink can satisfy his appetites; and to obtain these, he will give any thing, or do any thing, which he finds absolutely necessary. Thus the regenerate soul hungers and thirsts for Christ and his salvation, and is prepared to venture, part with, or suffer any thing, rather than come short of an interest in him.—A healthy man also relishes his meat and drink; and the lively Christian delights to feed on Christ, by receiving him for all the purposes of salvation, and living by faith in him.—The food for the body is the gift of God, yet man must labour for it; and our spiritual food must be laboured for, though given us by Christ. (Note, 22—27, v. 27.) The believer feels weariness and uneasiness, and is ready to faint under trials and labours; but, attending on divine ordinances, and receiving Christ by renewed exercises of faith as his daily meat and drink, he finds his spirits recruited, his heart encouraged, and his strength repaired, to run the race, endure the conflict, and perform the work appointed him.—As the flesh and blood of Christ are expressly mentioned here, as well as in the institution of the Lord's supper; numbers have contended, that the external ordinance was intended: in precisely the same way that baptism with water has been mistaken for "the new birth of the Spirit." (Notes, 3:4—8.) But the Lord's supper was not at this time instituted: and can any one seriously think that every man continues "dead in sin," and under condemnation, till he has received that sacrament? (which would absolutely, and without exception, exclude from salvation all who lived previous to its institution, all infants and young persons dying at that age, and an immense majority of adult professed Christians;) or imagine, that Christ dwells in, and will save, all those who partake of that ordinance, however hypocritically? No doubt it is the general duty of all real Christians, frequently to commemorate the death of Christ at his table: but this is merely the 'outward sign' of the blessing here intended; and those who rest in it will have only the shadow of salvation.—It is also remarkable, that the church, which of all others has most exalted, and even idolized, the Lord's supper, has refused the cup, the emblem of "the blood of Christ," to the laity; as if they would not allow them to have even the sign of salvation!—We know, however, from Scripture, that the justice and holiness of God, and the honour of his violated law, rendered such a sacrifice as that of the death of Christ necessary for us: and unless a man knows and owns his need of that atonement, and habitually lives on Christ for pardon, righteousness, and all things pertaining to salvation, "he hath no life in him." But he, who thus "eats the flesh and drinks the blood of the Son of man, hath eternal life;" he has the title to it, and the beginning of it: and the resurrection of his soul to spiritual life, is the pledge of the resurrection of his body to everlasting glory. For "the flesh of Christ is meat indeed," or, truly, emphatically, and exclusively; "and his blood is drink indeed;" (Marg. Ref. c—g;) insomuch that when we thus live by faith in the atonement of Christ, and receive from his fulness, we dwell in him, as our Refuge, Rest, and Home (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Ps. 90:1,2. 91:1,2.) and he dwells in us by his grace and Spirit, as in his temple; so that we are "one with him, and he with us." (Notes, 14:21—24. 17:22, 23. Eph. 2:19—22. 3:14—19. 1 John 4:9—17, vv. 12,13,16.) This mystical union even in some respects resembles that of the incarnate Son of God with the eternal Father: for as his life on earth was sustained by his union with the Deity, and by the in-dwelling of the Spirit; so believers are united to Christ, and live by that life which is hid in him, and they shall thus live for ever. (Marg. Ref. i, k—m. Note, Col. 3:1—4.)—'Whosoever eateth the flesh, and drinketh the blood of Christ, in the sense here spoken of, "abideth in Christ and Christ in him:" and therefore is a true and living member of Christ's body: and he shall have eternal life, and be partaker of a happy resurrection: and so no person can either be wicked here, or deprived of everlasting life hereafter, who, in the sense here mentioned, eats of the flesh and drinketh of the blood of Christ. Now this is very true of eating spiritually and by faith, as it imports believing in Christ. For "this," saith Christ, is the will of him that sent me, that every one who "believeth in the Son may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." But then of sacramental eating of Christ's flesh, it is as false: for this was eaten by a Judas, and continually is eaten by millions, who are both wicked here, and will be damned hereafter. This, therefore, cannot be the import of our Saviour's words.' Whitby.—Our Lord, however, must be supposed to refer to that sacred ordinance which he intended to appoint, as the memorial of his body broken and his blood shed, for the life of our souls, and as the outward sign of the manner in which we 'feed on him in our hearts by faith with thanksgiving;' as a public profession of our inwardly receiving his atonement, and as a pledge to all true believers of everlasting life. (Note, Matt. 26:26—28.)—Those who suppose that our Lord meant merely 'the sacramental eating of his flesh and blood;' whether they graft on this construction, Transubstantiation, Consubstantiation, or any blessing inseparably connected with the act of receiving, independent of the faith or unbelief of the receiver, doubtless pervert the words of Christ, to establish idolatry, superstition, formality, and self-righteousness. While such as speak of 'spiritually feeding on his words and doctrine,' without explicit reference to "faith in his blood," and 'feeding on him in our hearts, by faith with thanksgiving,' lead men by another road entirely away from this grand and central part of Christianity. They do not explicitly consider Christ as a High-Priest and a propitiatory sacrifice; and they confound him with prophets and apostles, on whose doctrine men might feed, but who never spoke of "giving their flesh for the life of the world;" or called on their hearers to "eat their flesh and drink their blood," as essential to salvation, and as infallibly ensuring it: and thus the most affecting view of that "love of Christ which passeth knowledge," in giving himself for our sins, and for our salvation, to death upon the cross, is wholly lost sight of, in explaining this most interesting display of it.

V. 60—65. It is not wonderful, that this discourse should astonish our Lord's audience: for though instruction had frequently been spoken of, as the food of the soul; yet no prophet, or servant of God from the beginning of the world, had spoken of himself as "the Bread of Life;" and Jesus evidently assumed to himself more than Moses or any other person ever had done, or could have done, without the greatest impropriety. He spake also on the most mysterious doctrines and the most experimental part of religion, with which few of the people were acquainted, and which militated against their strongest prejudices: therefore many, who had hitherto professed themselves "his disciples," concluded that it was "a hard saying," unintelligible, or incredible; and inquired, who could endure to hear and receive it, as of divine authority. But Jesus, by his perfect knowledge of their secret thoughts and conversation, was acquainted with their murmurs; (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 2:23—25. 8:30—36.) and he demanded, whether these sayings stumbled them, and induced them to forsake him. If this now so perplexed them, what would they think of it, if they should "see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?"—The human nature of Christ had not before been in heaven: but, being God and Man in one mysterious Person, that Person was called either "the Son of God," or "the Son of man," without exact discrimination; and in virtue of this indissoluble union, the Person called "the Son of man" might be said to have come down from heaven. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 3:12,13. Eph. 4:7—10.)—This implied, that the Messiah's kingdom was not of this world; for he would at length ascend into heaven, and appear no more personally among them. They were not therefore to understand, what he had said concerning "eating his flesh and drinking his blood," in a gross, carnal sense; but of spiritually living on him and on his fulness by faith: for, as the soul of man gives life to the body, without which the flesh is only a lifeless putrifying lump of clay; so, without the life-giving Spirit of God, or "that which is born of the Spirit, and is spirit," all forms of religion are dead and worthless. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 3:6. 2 Cor. 3:4—6,17,18.) Indeed the words which Jesus spake to them were "spirit and life:" they related to spiritual things on which the life of their souls depended; by believing and meditating on his words, trusting his promises, and thus living in a constant dependence on his atonement and mediation, they would spiritually "eat his flesh and drink his blood;" and these were the means, by which the Spirit of God would nourish their souls unto eternal life. But he spoke these things to them in this figurative manner, because some of them did not believe, and were disposed to make a perverse use of his instructions; and therefore he had before declared, for their warning, that "none could come to him except it were given him of his Father." (Notes, 41—46,66—71.)—"To be drawn by the Father," and to have "faith given by the Father," are synonymous terms, which plainly indicate the interpretation above given. Doddridge.—"My words are spirit and life; as being the means of obtaining the Spirit, and by him this life; to which effects my flesh, if you could eat it, would profit you nothing. Had our Lord said, "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing;" therefore the flesh, which I will give, shall be joined to my divinity, and by the virtue of it, give you life; he had said something like the sense which others put on the text:' (namely, the defenders of transubstantiation, and many protestant expositors, who seem rather to lean towards that monstrous opinion!) 'but saying only, "The words which I speak to you, they are spirit," we cannot doubt but he speaks of eating and of drinking his flesh and blood spiritually.' Whitby.

(See on 5:21.)—'I do not here understand το πνευμα, of the Holy Spirit: for πνευμα and σαρξ are evidently opposed to each other. ... In like manner, 2 Cor. 3:6, we have πνευμα opposed to γραμμα.' Bp. Middleton.—The Holy Spirit, personally, is not meant; but that spiritual understanding of the words of Christ, "as spirit and life," which are taught by God, through his Holy Spirit, to all who are "born of the Spirit."

V. 66—71. Many of the professed disciples, who forsook Jesus on this occasion, seem to have no more statedly attended on his personal ministry: but some of them might, after his ascension, when the event had explained his meaning, receive the instructions of his apostles. The multitudes, however, were at this time dispersed; 'seeing he was not such a Messias as they looked for; and would not be content with any kind of following him.' Hammond. Their secular expectations also were disappointed; and their real character detected. (Marg. Ref. a.) So that our Lord, having only his twelve disciples with him, asked them, "Will ye go away also?" intimating that he would have no unwilling followers. They too, were, in many things, greatly prejudiced and mistaken; and especially they were strangers to the real nature of salvation, through his atoning sacrifice, and by faith in him, as the "Propitiation for sin:" but in general they were teachable, upright believers. (Note, Matt. 16:21—23.) Peter, therefore, answering in the name of his brethren, inquired "to whom they should go," in case they left him. John, their former master, had directed them to him; they could get no benefit by becoming the disciples of the Pharisees; they knew no other, who could be regarded even as a divine teacher; and they could by no means give up the hope of eternal life, which they were engaged in the pursuit of as their first object; besides the temporal advantages they might expect by following him: and indeed they believed, and had been fully assured, that he was the promised Messiah, "that Christ, the Son of the living God;" and that eternal life could only be found by believing and obeying his words, and observing his instructions. (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, Matt. 16:13—17.) To this bold and explicit confession Jesus replied, in a manner apparently very abrupt; observing, that one of the twelve, whom he had chosen to be his apostles, was "a devil." He meant Judas Iscariot, who was a secret enemy, a designing hypocrite, and one who was in every thing of a diabolical disposition, though he had not been suspected by the other apostles; especially he was a spy, and would prove a traitor, a liar, and a murderer; like Satan the accuser of the brethren. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Thus Peter, and the rest of them, were taught to be upon their guard, and to answer for themselves alone: they were reminded, while "they thought they stood, to take heed lest they should fall;" and Judas was given to understand that his character was well known to his Lord. Probably, he took no notice of it; and the other apostles would not be able to understand his words till the event explained them, to their great astonishment. (Marg. Ref. i—l.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. The beneficence of our Lord's miracles concurred with the power of them, to convince the people that he was sent from God: and the same spirit of love displayed in our conduct, even amidst weakness and poverty, will best adorn the gospel, evince its divine origin and excellency, and conciliate the minds of men. If we copy the example of our Lord, in rendering hearty thanks to the Giver of all our temporal comforts, and in dispensing them liberally to the indigent; our most frugal and homely meals will be far more comfortable and blessed, than the most luxurious feasts of ungodly men. (Note, Ps. 37:16,17.) But moderation and indifference in respect of our own diet, and a parsimonious care to "gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost," form the very basis of Christian beneficence: and if in opulent cities, all that which is wasted or needlessly consumed, were reserved to feed the hungry; how much more comfortably would the poor be maintained! and how much better would it be both for the souls and bodies of the more affluent! Christians, however, at least, should be willing to fare as Christ did; to obey his commands, and to encounter difficulties at his word.—When he is not sensibly present with his people, he is pleading for them; and he will come to them through every intervening obstacle; and, by his power and love, terminate all their sorrows, fears, and hardships. (P. O. Matt. 14:14—36. Mark 6:30—56. 7:1—21.)

V. 22—29. If Jesus were again to appear on earth, feeding and healing men by miracle; he would again be followed by

CHAPTER VII.

Jesus, when counselled by his unbelieving brethren to show himself at Jerusalem, at the feast of tabernacles, assigning his reason, refuses to accompany them, but afterward is gone up privately, 1—10. The Jews seek him, and form different opinions of him, 11—13. He teaches in the temple; declares that his doctrine is of God, and answers objections, 14—29. Some seek to take him; others believe; and the Pharisees send officers to apprehend him, 30—32. He foretells his departure to the Father, when the Jews would in vain seek him, 33—36. He invites every one who is thirsty, to come to him and drink; referring to the Holy Spirit, which would be given to believers, 37—39. Divers opinions of him, 40—44. The officers, struck with his discourse, return without him, 45, 46. The Pharisees scornfully reproach them and the common people, and Nicodemus who took his part, 47—52. They are disconcerted, and separate, 53.

AFTER these things Jesus [a]walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Jewry, [b]because the Jews sought to kill him.

2 Now the Jews' [c]feast of tabernacles was at hand.

3 His [d]brethren therefore said unto him, Depart hence, and go into Judea, that thy disciples also may see the works that thou doest.

5 For [h]neither did his brethren believe in him.

6 Then Jesus said unto them, [i]My time is not yet come; but your time is alway ready.

admiring multitudes, who might even desire to have him for their King, in hopes of preferment and secular advantages: and indeed many profess his truths and attend on his ordinances, nay minister in holy things, who seek nothing more than "the loaves and fishes." They call him Rabbi, but will not be taught by him; they speak of him as their Saviour, but they do not rely on him for salvation; they say, "Lord, Lord, but will not do the things which he says." And though he exhorts all men "to labour, not for the meat that perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life:" yet most, even of those who 'profess and call themselves Christians,' labour incessantly, anxiously, and wholly, for perishing vanities, till death convinces them of their folly; and then others succeed them, and copy the example of their infatuation. (Note, Ps. 49:13.) But, to rational creatures possessed of immortal souls, nothing is worthy of the chief regard, or to be the object of primary diligence, which will not "endure unto everlasting life," and secure the possessor from final misery and despair. This enduring portion "the Son of man" is authorized to bestow on whom he pleases. Let us then direct all our earnestness, and employ all our labour, to secure "the one thing needful;" let us assiduously use every means, perform every duty, oppose every temptation, and seek the mortification of every sinful propensity: and in this way let us "wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." While we daily inquire, what are the works of God, which we are called to perform; let us remember, that an habitual faith in Christ, as our only and all-sufficient Saviour, is the most important, indispensable, and arduous part of the obedience required of us, as sinners seeking salvation. When by his grace we are enabled to "live this life of faith in the Son of God," all holy tempers follow, and all acceptable services may be performed; but without this no services, however splendid or admired by man, or thought highly of by us, will be regarded by our holy and merciful God. Yet this command, difficult as it is to a proud and carnal heart, only calls on a man who is poor, and deeply in debt, to come that he may be enriched; a malefactor, to accept of pardon and preferment; and a starving wretch, to partake of a feast, or rather of a constant, permanent, and eternal supply of all his wants, and of pleasures that always satisfy and never satiate. (Notes, Rev. 3:17—19.)

V. 30—35. Blessed be our God, that he has given us "the true Bread from heaven." May he create in us an appetite for it: that we may intelligently and cordially say, "Lord, evermore give us this Bread!" But when we look around us, we see men in general hungering after and feeding on husks or ashes: they "spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which satisfieth not." (Note, Is. 55:1—3.) Some feed on airy speculations, and "philosophy falsely so called:" some aim to satisfy their minds with gold, with fame, or power: some feed more grossly on sensual pleasure: and numbers attempt to allay their cravings after happiness, by dissipated mirth, or the pride of life. All these are like "a hungry man, who dreameth that he eateth, but he awaketh and his soul is empty:" for at length death comes, and their unsatisfied desires prove their eternal tormentors. Nay, many pretending to religion, take pleasure in superstitions, enthusiasm, notions, forms, controversies, or revilings: these also "feed upon ashes: a deceived heart hath turned them aside, that they cannot deliver their souls, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?" (Note, Is. 44:19,20.) But "the flesh of Christ is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed:" here the soul, which hungers and thirsts for God, for righteousness, and true felicity, and is made sensible of its state and wants, finds a suitable and abundant provision. Here pardon, peace, hope, communion with God, and whatever can calm the conscience, serene and cheer the heart, or promote true holiness, is comprised in one glorious Object, a mighty Redeemer, "God manifest in the flesh," shedding his precious blood to atone for the sins of his rebellious creatures! This is that "living Bread, which came down from heaven, that we might eat and live for ever." Oh, how adorable, how stupendous, is this love of our divine Redeemer! May this "love of Christ constrain us ... to live no longer to ourselves, but to him who died for us, and rose again." (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)

V. 36—46. Unhumbled sinners cannot understand spiritual things; (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) and therefore they either object and deride, or they rest in outward forms, instead of "the power of godliness." He alone who made the provision for our souls, can effectually teach these mysteries, and "draw us" unto Christ that we may live by faith in him. "All that the Father giveth" to the Son, will be thus taught, and will come to him; and he will surely receive and keep them, and "will raise them up at the last day." When therefore sinners are convinced of their need of Christ and his salvation, and that they cannot truly believe in him, except by the teaching and drawing of the Father; let them attend to his word, and pray for his Spirit, and in this way expect his blessing on their souls. For every one, who willingly comes to Christ, will be made welcome, and will on no account whatever be cast out. He has spoken the word, and he will make it good: it is his will, and "the will of the Father who sent him," and it cannot be invalidated. Let sinners then apply with confidence: "let the hearts of them rejoice who seek the LORD:" let them be thankful that they have discovered their danger and their remedy; and let them seek further instruction, that they may enjoy the comfort, and bring forth the fruits, of "the life of faith" in the incarnate Son of God; and so expect "the last day," in joyful and thankful assurance of a resurrection unto the eternal life and glory.

V. 47—59. The Jews could not, at the same time when the Lord spake to them, know his meaning: but we may know how Jesus can "give us his flesh to eat." The humble believer can rest in no outward emblem; but, through the sacramental bread and wine, he sees the body and blood of Christ, as truly appropriated by the faith of all acceptable communicants, for every saving purpose. He is convinced, that "except he eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood," he has no spiritual life in him, nor any good hope of eternal life: and therefore his great fear is, lest he should be deceived in a matter of such immense importance. He is often ready to faint and be weary, through inward conflicts and outward troubles: but by again receiving Christ, as the Life and Salvation of his soul, he finds his hopes revive, his fears vanish, his strength return, and his graces invigorated; and thus he feeds daily on Christ, and proceeds in his work and warfare with patient alacrity. He finds, that meditation on the cross of Christ, and all the glorious truths connected with it, give life and vigour to his repentance, faith, hope, love, and gratitude; his heart is thus raised above, weaned from the world, and fixed on heavenly things; he is enabled to rejoice in the Lord; he 'dwells in Christ, and Christ in him,' and he learns to live by his beloved Saviour, in some measure as he lived by the Father that sent him, and to his glory. This is the Christian's life: in proportion as he thus lives upon Christ, and thirsts and applies for the blessings procured for us by his precious blood; he copies more and more closely his example, and obeys his commandments, and may rejoice, under all trials, and at the approach of death, "in the hope of the glory of God." (Notes, Rom. 5:3—11. Gal. 2:17—21. 6:11—14, v. 14. 1 Pet. 4:1,2.)

V. 60—71. Many, who are called disciples, dispute against the words of Christ: many attend to the general doctrines of the gospel; but when ministers apply them to their consciences and experience, they are ready to exclaim, "It is a hard saying, who can hear it?" They form gross conceptions of spiritual things, and argue against their own mistakes and misrepresentations: so that those preachers who imitate their Master, need not wonder, if their faithful doctrine drives away numbers who for a time seemed zealously attached to them. We must, however, speak the words of Christ, "which are spirit and life," and not like the dead notions of moralists and speculators: (Notes, Jer. 23:28,29. Matt. 7:28,29. Heb. 4:12,13.) and we must leave it to him to "quicken whom he will" by his Spirit, and to determine who are, and who are not, true believers.—Our main business is with ourselves: when many turn back, and walk no more with Christ, he seems to say to us, "Will ye go away also?" But the truly broken-hearted, who can rest satisfied with nothing short of eternal life, will answer, "Lord, to whom shall I go;" Even when discouraged, tempted, and harassed with doubts and fears; he still knows it is vain to think of returning to the world, of seeking salvation by "the works of the law," of resting in forms and notions, or of going after false teachers: and still he believes, and desires to be fully assured, that Jesus has "the words of eternal life," as "the Christ, the Son of the living God." This faith, in its feeblest exercise, is essentially different from that of the most specious hypocrite, who ever followed the steps of the traitor Judas: such are often near to Christ in external profession and office, yet like Satan in the temper of their hearts and secret conduct; but they are known and will be detected by the heart-searching Judge, however they may impose upon their brethren. May we then be now searched and proved by him; and may our "hearts be made sound in his statutes," as those whom he has "chosen unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and the belief of his holy truth." NOTES.—Chap. VII. V. 1. For a considerable time, our Lord went about Galilee, preaching the gospel; but he did not choose thus to go about preaching in Judea, because he knew that the rulers were determined to put him to death. He did not see good at that time to expose himself to their rage; or to work his miracles and give his instructions amidst such virulent and insidious enemies. It may be supposed, that he attended the passover and other appointed feasts: but he went up privately, and continued only a short time at Jerusalem, or in the neighbourhood. (Marg. Ref.)—The term walked, implies, that he did not continue in the same place, but went from one town or village to another, teaching and healing.—Our Lord was descended from Judah, and therefore a Jew, or Judean, in the strict and literal sense of the word, and the special honour of that tribe in particular, as well as of the nation in general; (Notes, Gen. 49:9,10.) yet his ministry was more favourably attended, in the remote parts of the land where many of the inhabitants belonged to other tribes, than in Judea, which was chiefly occupied by the tribe of Judah. In this sense likewise, "He came to his own, and his own received him not."

V. 3—10. Perhaps these brethren, or kinsmen, of our Lord were disgusted, because they saw no prospect of secular advantages from their relation to him; which they had expected, in case he was the promised Messiah: and therefore, notwithstanding his miracles, and the holiness of his character and doctrine, they suspected that he was a deceiver, and concluded that he acted from secular motives. They professed friendship, when they advised him to go into Judea, to preach and work miracles, among the rich, powerful, and learned of the nation: and they intimated that he must have many disciples there, who would thus be encouraged openly to espouse his cause; that so the numbers of his adherents being increased, he might proceed openly to assert his claim to the kingdom of the Messiah. They urged, that it was unreasonable, and contrary to all ordinary rules of policy, for him to continue in an obscure part of the country, when his object must be to make himself known: and they concluded, that if he meant to proceed, he ought to stand forth publicly, and "show himself to the world." (Marg. Ref. d—h.) By this insidious counsel they probably meant to lead him into danger, desiring that the scribes and Pharisees might examine his pretences; at least they were actuated by merely carnal motives. He therefore told them, that his time for going up to the feast, or of avowing himself amidst his enemies, was not yet arrived: but their time was always ready, and they might go up to Jerusalem with safety whenever they chose. The world could have no enmity against them; as their maxims, principles, and conduct, were congenial with those of other ungodly men, and served to keep them in countenance: but "the world," including the unconverted of every description, must hate him, because he "testified of them that their works were evil." He not only exposed the heinousness of men's evident immoralities and impieties: but he detected the pride and hypocrisy of the austere and superstitious scribes and Pharisees; he testified even against their supposed good works, that they sprang from a corrupt source, and were "abomination in the sight of God;" and he showed that men of all nations, sects, and external characters, were deserving of the awful wrath and abhorrence of God, for the wickedness of their hearts and lives. These things affronted the pride, disquieted the consciences, interfered with the pursuits, and excited the indignation, of the world in general: thus he was mortally hated by them, notwithstanding the perfection of his character, and the power of his miracles: and the same effects will always be produced by the same cause. (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes, 15:17—21. 17:13—16. Is. 49:7,8. Zech. 11:7—9. 1 John 3: 13—15. 4:4—6. 5:19.)—It is probable, that these brethren of Christ went up, with many others, some days before the feast: our Lord, however, had his reasons for not going with them, as "his time was not yet fully come." He perhaps knew that his enemies would have taken umbrage if he had gone up with a multitude of attendants; therefore he chose to go privately, and just before the feast began. (Marg. Ref. n—p.)—'It is not to be doubted, but that Jesus arrived in time, in order to observe that feast of seven days most accurately, and indeed without omitting so much as one tittle of the law; ... as bound for the sake of his people, to keep the whole law most perfectly. Yet for the same cause,' (that above assigned,) 'he did not openly enter the temple, till the middle of the feast; that he might, in his Father's house, perform the office committed to him by his Father.' Beza. Attendance on the sacred festivals was a part of the obedience which the law required, to which our Lord willingly subjected himself; and this he perfectly obeyed. This attendance also gave him the opportunity of teaching great multitudes from many different places, and confirming his doctrine by miracles before them. Yet in availing himself of these opportunities, a wise regard to circumstances was in all respects highly important.—There is reason to conclude that these brethren of our Lord afterwards became his disciples. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. Luke 8:19—21. Acts 1:13,14.)

In these, and many other places, "the world" especially means, unholy professed worshippers of God, and in particular marks out the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees. And are not nominal Christians, of the same character, "the world," at this day, as much as either Jews, Gentiles, or Mohammedans?—Evil. (7) Πονηρα, "wicked."

V. 11—13. The Jews sought our Lord; which implies that he constantly attended on the three great feasts, though we have not a particular account of it. Some of the people concluded, from his conduct, doctrine, and miracles, that he must be a good and holy man: but others would not allow him even this inferior honour; concluding that he imposed on the people by some artifice, which they were not able to detect: and those who favoured him dared not openly to avow their sentiments, lest the rulers should censure or excommunicate them. Perhaps the Galileans might also fear, lest the Jews should inform against them as his adherents.—'They that thought contemptibly of Christ might have spoken their minds as freely as they pleased.' Doddridge. This has often been the case; and still is in very many places, even where Christianity is professed.—'An example of horrible confusion in the very bosom of the church! The pastors keep the people under oppression by fear and terror, the people seek Christ when he does not appear, and neglect him when he offereth himself to them. .. Some, that know, rashly condemn him; and very few think rightly of him, and that in secret.' Beza. It may be added, that of those who most decidedly favoured him, very few indeed had just views of his person, salvation, and kingdom.

19 Did [h]not Moses give you the law, and [i]yet none of you keepeth the law? [k]Why go ye about to kill me?

20 The people answered and said, [l]Thou hast a devil: who goeth about to kill thee?

21 Jesus answered and said unto them, [m]I have done one work, and ye all marvel.

22 Moses therefore gave unto you [n]circumcision, (not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers,) and ye on the sabbath-day circumcise a man.

23 If a man on the sabbath-day receive circumcision, [o]that the law of Moses should not be broken; are ye angry at me, because I have [p]made a man every whit whole on the sabbath-day?

putes about those opinions; but without displeasure or irritation against Jesus.

V. 14—17. Our [1]Lord saw good for a time to conceal himself; not appearing as usual in the courts of the temple: yet he would not lose the opportunity of preaching to the multitudes, who were assembled from distant nations on this occasion. So that about the middle of the feast, which lasted eight days, (Note, Lev. 23:34—36.) he went up to the temple, and taught the people. But the inhabitants of Judea inquired, with a mixture of surprise and disdain, how he could have sufficient learning, and knowledge of the law, to qualify him as a public instructer; seeing he had been brought up in an obscure manner, and without any of the advantages of a liberal education. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y—b.) To this objection our Lord replied, that his doctrine (or in the instruction which he delivered) was not his own, as men acquire knowledge by study and tuition, and so teach their own opinions, or those of their master; or as false prophets speak out of their own hearts; (Marg. Ref. c. Num. 16:28. Note, Jer. 23:25—27.) but that it was the message, which he came to deliver from "Him that sent him:" so that it was to be considered as the testimony of God himself brought down from heaven, and declared without any mixture or alteration. And as his doctrine was divine, so the preparation of mind, for understanding it, did not consist in natural quickness or vigour of capacity, or in human learning; but in a sincere willingness, and earnest desire, to "do the will of God:" insomuch that the man who was brought to this temper, and was determined to obey the command of God, however it might interfere with his interests or prospects, and though it should expose him to persecution, would use proper means for becoming acquainted with the truth, and be enabled to "know of the doctrine whether it were of God, or whether he spake of himself," as one who deceived the people.—When the heart is thus disposed "to do the will of God," it rises above the prejudices of pride, self-love, and worldly hopes and fears, which cloud and bias the understanding of others. This state of mind is also the effect of divine grace; and He who has given any one such a measure of seriousness, teachableness, and integrity, will assist him to discern and embrace the truth, and to detect and refuse error. (Marg. Ref. d—e. Notes, Ps. 25:8,9. 119:33. Prov. 2:1—9. 23:23. Is. 35:8—10. Jer. 50:4—6. P. O. 1—8. Notes, Acts 8:26—40. 10:1—8.) Indeed every one, who is thus decided to do the will of God, is afraid of being deceived, distrusts himself, and seeks diligently for divine teaching. So that, in every way, he will be guided through all mazes of uncertainty and controversy, to the knowledge of every essential truth; and all, who are fatally deluded, must be allowed to be destitute of this ingenuous upright disposition.—'If any man shall, with a simple and honest heart, yield himself over to do the will of my Father, according to the measure of that he knows, God shall encourage and bless that man with further light; so as he shall fully know, whether my doctrine be of God, or of myself.' Bp. Hall. '"He shall know of the doctrine," that is, he shall have means sufficient to convince him that it is of God.' Whitby. —All who hear the word of God, 'have means sufficient to convince them:' but the person described by our Lord shall actually be convinced. The means to him shall be rendered effectual: otherwise what does the promise amount to?—Will do his will. (17) Θελη το θελημα αυτου ποιειν.—"Willeth to do his will," or purposeth. It is his object and aim, in seeking to know the will of God. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 12:46—50, v. 50.)

V. 18. Our Lord added another general rule. The teacher, who is not sent of God, will in one way or other seek his own honour and advancement, having no higher principle than corrupt selfish nature: whereas he, who evidently disregards himself that he may seek the honour of God, proves himself to be truly sent by him; and is free from all ground of suspicion, as if he were an impostor, or acted from any sinister design. Applying this to Christ, who endured poverty, contempt, hardship, suffering, and death, for the glory of God in man's salvation; and who boldly taught those doctrines, which excited the enmity and rage of the rulers and Pharisees, and yet equally opposed the carnal prejudices of the common people, and so disgusted them; it was evident that he was "true, and that there was no unrighteousness in him." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 5:39—44. 2 Cor. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 2:1—8, vv. 5—8. 2 Pet. 1:16—18.)

V. 19—24. It was at least a year and a half (probably longer) since Jesus had healed the man at the pool of Bethesda: (Notes, 5:1—9.) yet the Jewish rulers were still desirous of putting him to death for a supposed infraction of the sabbath on that occasion; and he saw proper to refer to their designs in his public preaching, in order to obviate the people's prejudices against his doctrine. He observed, that they were zealously attached to Moses, their great lawgiver; yet scarcely any of them were conscientiously obedient to the law. For why did they go about to kill him, in direct opposition to the sixth commandment? (Marg. Ref. h—k.) To this, some of them, who were ignorant of the designs of the rulers, replied, in a rude and contemptuous manner, that he certainly was possessed by a devil, and was insane: for "who went about to kill him?" (Marg. Ref. l.) To this indecent reflection Jesus meekly answered, that he had wrought one miracle at Jerusalem, which excited their astonishment; not so much by the power and goodness displayed in it, as because he did it on the sabbath-day, and ordered the man to carry his bed in evidence of his cure. (Notes, 5:10—16,45—47.) But, as to that accusation, they should observe, that Moses had enjoined them the law of circumcision; (though it had been practised long before his time by their fathers;) yet they could not observe that law without deviating from the exact rest, which they supposed to be required on the sabbath: for when the eighth day happened on the sabbath, they used to circumcise the male child, that they might not defer that ordinance beyond the appointed time; nor did they deem this labour any violation of the holy rest. But if this were right, as no doubt it was, why should they blame him for restoring a man, diseased in every part of his body, on that day, to perfect soundness, by a word speaking? Surely the law of love was as binding as that of circumcision! and it was as consistent with the design of the sabbath, to restore health to the afflicted, as to administer an external rite. He therefore demanded of them, not to judge by their partial prejudices, or by his external appearance; but to decide on his conduct in an equitable manner, according to the spiritual import of the divine law.—Circumcision was at first given to Abraham, as "the seal of the righteousness of faith," and of the covenant made with him in Christ; though it was afterwards made a part of the ceremonial law. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Gen. 17:7—12. Rom. 4:9—12. Gal. 3:15—18. 5:1—6.) Our Lord seems here to have referred to this circumstance, which the Jews generally overlooked, thus confounding together the Sinai-covenant, and that made with Abraham, as indeed numbers still do.

Ye all marvel. Moses therefore, &c. (21,22.) Παντες θαυμαζετε. Δια τουτο Μωσης, κ. τ. λ.—Some point these words thus, Παντες θαυμαζετε δια τουτο. Μωσης δεδωκεν, κ. τ. λ. "Ye all marvel at this. Not elsewhere.—The face alone appears, the rest is hid: yet this defective view causes the decision. (Note, 1 Sam. 16:6,7.) "I have made the whole man sound on the sabbath-day." The nature of the disease, wholly disabling the man, as well as the completeness of the cure, seems intended.

V. 25—30. While this subject was under consideration, some of the stated inhabitants of Jerusalem, who were acquainted with the designs of the council, (of which they who came from other places were ignorant,) inquired, whether this were not the person, whom the rulers had resolved to put to death as a deceiver: and they were astonished that he was allowed to speak in so open a manner, and met with no interruption. (Marg. Ref. q—t.) Was it possible, that the rulers should at length be persuaded, that he was indeed the promised Messiah? They, however, knew him to be an inhabitant of Nazareth, the son of Mary the wife of Joseph; but when the Messiah came, no man would know whence he was.—Doubtless these persons were ignorant of our Lord's descent from David, of his miraculous conception, and of his nativity at Bethlehem; and they rashly concluded, that his parentage and birth did not answer to those predicted of the Messiah: yet they seem to have had some confused idea of the divine original of that great Redeemer; and thence they decided, that "when he came no man would know whence he was." Had their prejudices allowed them to examine, they would have found their objection sufficiently answered by the circumstances of our Lord's nativity. Some think that the Messiah's birth of a virgin was referred to; and others, that a tradition of the Jews, that the Messiah when he came would for a long time be hidden, was meant: but it is more probable, that an erroneous construction of some prophecies, which relate to his eternal Deity, had drawn away their minds from the plainer and more express predictions on the subject. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—Our Lord, however, knowing their reasonings, though spoken privately, and at a distance, proclaimed aloud, in reproof of their obstinate and ignorant opposition, that they indeed vainly imagined that they both "knew him and whence he was," and were sure that he was not the Messiah. Yet "he was not come of himself," but was sent by God, who testified of him, and showed himself true to his promises and prophecies: for, though they professed to be worshippers of God, they did not know his perfections and the glory of them, and had no spiritual or experimental acquaintance with him. But he perfectly and intimately knew him, being from him, and sent by the Father to make him known to men. (Marg. Ref. y—d. Notes, 5:31—38. 8:17—20, v. 19. 48—59, vv. 54,55.)—This declaration, that they knew not God, joined to his claim of such a knowledge of God as was peculiar to himself, exasperated the hearers so much, that they sought an opportunity to apprehend him: but, as "his hour was not yet come," they were supernaturally restrained from touching him.—Ye both, &c. (28) Or, "Do ye both know me, and know whence I am?"—He "that sent me is true;" the true God: or, "my real Father," and not Joseph, as ye suppose.

Indeed. (26) Αληθως.—Very.] Αληθως. See on 6:55. The latter αληθως is wanting in some copies.—Was not yet come. (30) Ουπω εληλυθει. 6,8.—In the verses referred to, the proper time of our Lord's going up to Jerusalem seems meant: here, the hour when he should be apprehended and put to death.

V. 31—36. The arguments and replies of Jesus convinced many of the people, that he was the Messiah; and they secretly inquired or whispered among themselves, whether that great Deliverer, when he came, could work greater miracles than Jesus did. Some spies, however, carried the report of this to the Pharisees, who were the more exasperated; as they saw that their reputation, authority, and interest must be ruined, if the people received him in this character. Assembling therefore the council, they "sent officers to take him," and bring him before them in a chamber of the temple, where they were convened. (Marg. Ref. g—k.) When the officers were come, Jesus observed that he should continue with them a little longer, notwithstanding their designs against him; but that he should shortly return to the Father who had sent him. Then they might seek him; some of them from malice, and others from a vain desire of help in their extreme distress: but they would not find him: (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. Heb. 11:5,6.) nor would they ever be able to enter that happy place whither he was going. (Note, 8:21—26.) This referred to the calamities which were coming on the Jewish nation for their enmity to Jesus, and to their vain waiting and seeking for the promised Messiah to rescue them. But they could not understand whither he meant to go, having no idea of his ascension into heaven: they therefore inquired, whether he intended to go among the Jews, who were dispersed in other nations; and in case they would not receive him as the Messiah, to become a Teacher of the idolatrous Gentiles themselves? This they would consider as the most despicable and disgraceful employment imaginable. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. n, o.)

The dispersed. (35) Την διασπορων. Jam. 1:1. Not elsewhere.—The Gentiles.] Των Ελληνων. Some think that the dispersion of nations, when God confounded the languages at Babel, is referred to; and that the Gentiles dispersed on that occasion were intended: but the passage seems rather to mean, those countries of the Gentiles into which the Jews were dispersed.—Ελληνων. properly "Greeks." (Note, Acts 11:19—21.)

V. 37—39. As the officers, who came to take Jesus, returned after what is here recorded; it must have been on this day that they were sent to take him. (45) On "the last day, the great day of the feast" of tabernacles, there was a holy convocation; (Notes, Lev. 23:34—36.) and it is recorded, that the people used to draw and pour out water before the Lord. In allusion, as it is supposed, to this ceremony, Jesus stood forth in a conspicuous situation, and proclaimed aloud, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Thus he declared himself to be the unfailing source of salvation to perishing sinners; yea, "the Fountain of living waters," in opposition to the broken cisterns of mere creatures; and in fact he spake as the all-sufficient God. (Marg. Ref. r—x. Notes, 4:10—15. Ps. 36:5—9. Is. 55:1—3. Matt. 11:27—30. Rev. 21:5—8, v. 6. 22:1,16,17.) If any man felt himself destitute, exposed to misery, and desirous of true happiness; let him come to Jesus, and his wants would be supplied, his distress prevented or removed, his desires satisfied. If any sinner were disquieted with guilt, and fear of wrath, and experienced fervent desires after the favour of God, communion with him, and recovery to holiness; let him come to Jesus, and his terrors should be dissipated, and the blessings thirsted after be granted. But as this thirst especially means vehement longing after spiritual blessings, which nothing can divert or satisfy except the enjoyment of them; so the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit were particularly intended. For he added, that every one who believed in him, would be so replenished, that "out of his belly would flow rivers of living water," whence plentiful streams, yea rivers, would flow forth, for the quickening, sanctifying, and comforting of others also. This holy and fervent affection, as connected with divine knowledge and wisdom, would produce such a tenor of edifying conversation and exemplary practice, and such an improvement of every talent, as would render the man a channel, as it were, by which spiritual blessings would be conveyed to those with whom he associated. (Notes, Matt. 12:33—37, v. 35. Eph. 4:29.) This might be especially intended of the apostles, and the preachers of the gospel; but, in a subordinate sense, it is the case of all zealous Christians.—The evangelist here notes, that our Lord spoke this of the Spirit, which believers were afterwards to receive: "for the Holy Ghost was not yet: because Jesus was not yet glorified." "Holy men of old had indeed spoken, as they were moved by the Holy 38 He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, [y]out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

39 (But [z]this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: [a]for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet [b]glorified.)

40 Many of the people therefore, when they heard this saying, said, [c]Of a truth this is the Prophet.

41 Others said, [d]This is the Christ. But some said, [e]Shall Christ come out of Galilee?

42 Hath [f]not the Scripture said, that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, [g]where David was?

43 So [h]there was a division among the people because of him.

44 And some of them would have taken him; [i]but no man laid hands on him.

45 Then came [k]the officers to the chief priests and Pharisees; and they said unto them, Why have ye not brought him?

46 The officers answered, [l]Never man spake like this man.

47 Then answered them the Pharisees, [m]Are ye also deceived?

48 Have [n]any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him?

49 But [o]this people, who knoweth not the law, are cursed.

50 Nicodemus saith unto them, [p](he that came [q]to Jesus by night, being one of them,)

51 Doth [r]our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?

52 They answered and said unto him, [s]Art thou also of Galilee? [t]Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet.

53 And [u]every man went unto his own house.

V. 40—53. This open declaration and invitation of our Lord, with his other public instructions, excited a fresh debate, and a division, or schism, among the people concerning him: as some deemed him that prophet who, they supposed, would precede the Messiah; and others the promised Messiah himself. But to this it was objected, that Jesus was of Galilee; whereas the Messiah was to be a descendant of David, and a native of Bethlehem. Thus they remained under the power of prejudice, because they did not make diligent and impartial inquiry concerning him. (Marg. Ref. c—h.) Yet, amidst these disputes, even such of the officers as were disposed to apprehend him, could not summon resolution to do it: so they returned to the council without him; and, being questioned concerning their conduct, they replied, "Never man spake as this person does!" His discourses were inimitably powerful and convincing, and delivered with unspeakable dignity and propriety. (Marg Ref. i—l. Note, Matt. 7:28,29.) This enraged the proud and envious Pharisees, who demanded, whether they likewise were deceived into the opinion of his being the Messiah. And, making their own example the test of truth, they inquired whether any of the rulers, or even of the Pharisees, the most learned, eminent, and religious men in the nation, "had believed in him:" for as to the ignorant multitude, who followed him, they knew nothing of the meaning of the Scriptures, and were deserving to be despised and execrated of men, as well as accursed of God; being given up as under a curse to judicial blindness. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) To this Nicodemus ventured to reply, by inquiring, whether their law judged and condemned any man unheard, and without examining him concerning the things of which he was accused. (Notes, 3:1,2. Deut. 17:8—13. 19:15—21.) This implied a direct answer to their inquiry: here was a ruler, a teacher, and a Pharisee, who at least favoured Jesus. Accordingly they began to revile him, as if he had spoken like a contemptible Galilean: and required him to examine, and he would find that no prophet arose out of Galilee. This was a rule, for which they had no ground in Scripture; for Jonah, at least, was a native of Gath-hepher, or Gittah-hepher, in Galilee: (Josh. 19:13. 2 Kings 14:25.) and they could not mean the Messiah exclusively: for this would have implied that they might oppose and persecute other prophets. They spoke, however, in the heat of irritation, without well considering the import of their own words; yet Nicodemus's interposition disconcerted their measures, and they did not proceed any further in their design at that time. (Marg. Ref. p—t.) Have any of the rulers, &c. (48,49.) This is plainly the popish argument, by which they attempt to prove that private men, Laics, and inferior priests, are not to be governed by their own sentiments of Christ's doctrine; but must submit to their general councils, and to the major part of their church guides. And ... it is as strong in the mouth of the Pharisees, against Christ being the true Messiah, as in the mouth of Papists against Protestants.' Whitby. It is also employed by nominal Protestants against such companies as they choose to brand by some opprobrious name.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. No external evidences or advantages can overcome the obstinacy and enmity of the human heart, or secure the sinner's conversion: we need not then be disconcerted by the contempt and opposition of our nearest relations, when we remember that the brethren of the holy Jesus "did not believe in him."—Worldly men commonly judge of others by themselves; and so ascribe their most unexceptionable actions, however modestly and humbly performed, to ostentation, ambition, spiritual pride, or some selfish motive; knowing that their own most specious conduct springs from no higher principles. They often likewise attempt to give salutary and friendly counsel, with apparent seriousness, to those who are employed in the service of God: yet they can only propose such things, as apparently conduce to their present advantage, and really tend to their injury and disgrace. (Note, 1 Kings 22:13,14.) But the spiritual man sees a variety of reasons for his conduct, and for the time and manner of his proceedings, of which others have no capacity to judge. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) He knows himself to be surrounded with enemies, who hate him, in proportion as his example, conversation, or more public testimony, exposes the wickedness of men's hearts and lives; protests against the corrupt maxims, pursuits, and fashions of the world; and shows the evil even of their boasted morality, religion, and benevolence, when tarnished by pride, hypocrisy, and enmity to the gospel. He is therefore aware that he needs "the wisdom of the serpent," as well as "the harmlessness of the dove:" (Note, Matt. 10:16—18, v. 16.) he consults the word of God, and prays for the teaching of his Spirit: he is decided against carnal advice, and leaves worldly counsellors to possess unenvied that "friendship of the world which is enmity against God;" (Note, Jam. 4:4—6.) that he may follow the dictates of heavenly wisdom, and the counsel of an enlightened conscience.

V. 11—18. The servants of Christ must expect to follow him "through evil report and good report." The most faithful preachers of his gospel must be content to be called by numbers, "deceivers of the people;" though others will allow them to be good men; and some perhaps think better of them than they deserve, which none ever could do of their Lord and Master. But in general they, who count them deceivers, will speak openly their sentiments: while many who favour them will be afraid of incurring reproach, by avowing their regard to them.—Any plausible objection, the result of ignorance and indolent mistake, will often more than counterbalance the fullest proof of a man's being employed and accepted by God: for the cause is tried before partial judges, who will only hear evidence on one side of the question. Some prejudice, concerning the family, country, or education of the faithful teacher, is employed by Satan, to stop the ears of his servants against the truth: and the charge of ignorant and illiterate is adduced, against the most scriptural preachers, by such as have not yet learned "the first principles of the oracles of God," however accomplished they may be, in that "wisdom of the world which is foolishness with him." But in an inferior sense, every faithful minister, wherever educated, may humbly adopt the words of Christ. His doctrine is not his own invention, nor does it spring, either from his learning or his ignorance: but it is from God, deduced from his word through the teaching of his Spirit; who commands it to be preached for the glory of his name. All therefore, who

CHAPTER VIII.

Jesus teaches at the temple, 1, 2. The Pharisees lay a snare for him, in respect of a woman taken in adultery; but he turns it to their confusion, and warns the woman to sin no more, 3—11. He declares himself to be the Light of the world, 12; justifies his doctrine, shows that his Father bore witness to him, and predicts the doom of unbelievers, 13—29. Many believe, whom he exhorts "to continue in his word;" promising them liberty by the knowledge of the truth, 30—32. He refutes the cavils and detects the vain-confidence of the Jews who opposed him; showing that they are the slaves of sin, and the children of the devil, 33—47. Being reviled, as a Samaritan and possessed, he refutes the charge, promises life to believers, asserts his dignity, and adds "Before Abraham was, I AM," 48—58. He withdraws from those who attempt to stone him, 59.

JESUS [a]went unto the mount of Olives.

2 And [b]early in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him: [c]and he sat down, and taught them.

3 And the scribes and Pharisees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery; and, when they had set her in the midst, 4 They say unto him, Master, this woman was taken in adultery, in the very act.

5 Now [d]Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned: [e]but what sayest thou?

6 This they said, [f]tempting him, that they might have to accuse him. [g]But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, [h]as though he heard them not.

7 So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, [i]and said unto them, [k]He that is with out sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.

8 And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground.

9 And they which heard it, [l]being convicted by their own conscience, [m]went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left [n]alone, and the woman standing in the midst.

10 When Jesus had lifted up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, [o]where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee?

11 She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, [p]Neither do I condemn thee: [q]go, and sin no more. [Practical Observations.] presume to engage in this work, should daily study and pray over the Scriptures, in order to possess a well-grounded confidence, that the grand subjects of their instructions are agreeable to "the oracles of God." They ought likewise to "take heed to themselves, as well as to their doctrine;" that thus they may always have the "rejoicing in the testimony of their consciences," as not seeking their own glory, the applause of their hearers or any filthy lucre, (as all do, who speak of themselves,) but the glory of God in the salvation of souls. Then it will appear, that "there is no unrighteousness in them," nor any reason to suspect them of bad motives, in the exercise of their ministry. But, amidst the various opinions and controversies about religion, which agitate the world; what a blessed encouragement is it to the honest inquirer to remember, that "if any man," of any nation, "is willing to do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether men speak of themselves!" The word of the Lord is passed, and cannot be recalled; and all, who desire earnestly and seek diligently to know the will of God, in order to reduce it to practice, shall be guided through every labyrinth of uncertainty, and past every precipice of error, into the ways of truth and peace; and they only shall be given up to strong and destructive delusions, "who hate the truth because they have pleasure in unrighteousness." (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)

V. 19—36. Unbelievers may be very zealous for their own views of religion, and vehemently persecute those who dissent from them; while at the same time, they are acting in direct opposition to the plain precepts of Scripture, and indulging the most diabolical tempers: and when the least check is given them, they revile and abuse others, as if all, not of their party, were unworthy of the least regard. Such men, in their zeal for doctrines, (perhaps true in themselves, though held by them in a perverted manner,) entirely overlook the genuine tendency of them; and are full of pride and rage, in disputing for the most humiliating and conciliatory truths! If external ordinances be their idol, they pervert them to purposes diametrically opposite to their true intention: and they condemn in others things of the same nature with those which they allow in themselves, or undeniably better. But it behooves us to consider matters more candidly and impartially; that we may "not judge according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment." We should also guard against the folly of opposing our preconceived opinions to such instructions as have the appearance of being from God.—If we would understand religion, we must endeavour, by diligently searching the Scriptures, and by fervent prayer, to "be taught of God," clearly to understand the glory and harmony of the divine perfections; and we must seek this knowledge of God from the incarnate Son, and by contemplating his character, miracles, life, and death: (Note, 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) otherwise we shall set up a false system in opposition to the truth; and be in danger of being seduced to concur with those who, in every age, have been enraged to persecution by the success of the true gospel of God our Saviour.—For a short time Christ continues by his word and ministers, among those who reject his salvation: yet the day, both of life and of grace, is of transient and uncertain continuance; and afterwards sinners, in their misery, would be glad of that help which now they despise. But it will soon become in vain to seek him; and where he is, thither shall no unbeliever enter for ever. They may dispute, reason, and murmur about such faithful and alarming sayings at present; but the event will explain them: and in the mean time he will continue to teach his people, who are dispersed throughout the nations, and even as poor sinners of the Gentiles.

V. 37—53. Still the divine Redeemer proclaims aloud to every man, "Let him who is athirst, come to me and drink." Happy then is he whom nothing can satisfy, except the favour, image, and enjoyment of God! Let him come unto Jesus, that this thirst may be allayed, and let him not fear a repulse.—From our smitten Rock the waters of life flow forth abundantly, to follow the true Israelites through this barren wilderness. (Notes, Ex. 17:5,6. 1 Cor. 10:1—5.) The miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit we do not now expect; but for his more ordinary and more valuable sanctifying influences we may confidently pray: these will not only be "in us a well of water springing up into everlasting life," but they will flow forth in our words and works, to water, fructify, and refresh our fellow-pilgrims in the desert, and to be the means of quickening such as were dead in sin. (Notes, P. O. Ex. 17:1—12.)—From our glorified Redeemer these holy streams have flowed, through the medium of the apostles, evangelists, and a succession of believers, down to us in this distant age, and in this remote corner of the earth. may we communicate them to those around us, and to such as shall succeed us, till the whole world be replenished by them.—But alas! how few are thus athirst! Even they who are for a time impressed and restrained, and who speak highly of the words of Jesus, as more excellent than those of all other teachers, "speaking as never man spake," often speedily lose their convictions, and go on in their sins: while proud infidels and Pharisees, with carnal scribes and priests, consider all as deluded, who coincide not with them in opinion. Frequently they revile, as ignorant enthusiasts, or designing hypocrites, such men, as are far more serious, diligent, and impartial in searching for the truth, than themselves; and whose words and works are sober, scriptural, and exemplary: but it seems enough for them to answer by saying, "Have any of the rulers and Pharisees believed in him?" Whereas the opinions of men of this description have more generally been a criterion of error, than the test of truth. But if a few of their own rank, education, or description are convinced of the truth and dare to avow it: they likewise are directly treated with obloquy and contempt, as weak deluded persons, who have suffered themselves to become the dupes of fanatics and imposters. Thus the wicked from age to age proceed in precisely the same track: yet the Lord gradually brings forward the weak and timid of his sincere disciples, and makes use of them to disconcert the politic designs of his enemies; for "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure."

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that our Lord went every evening to Bethany, to the house of Martha, where he was more retired than he could have been in the city: but it is by some supposed, that he spent this night on the mount of Olives, in devotion. He, however, returned early in the morning to the temple, that he might instruct the people there assembled, before they left Jerusalem the day after the conclusion of the feast of tabernacles. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—11. While our Lord was teaching the multitudes, his enemies concerted a plan for drawing him into a snare. A woman had been taken in adultery, whose guilt was undeniable: they therefore professed a deference to his judgment and authority, and brought the criminal to him, that he might decide what punishment should be inflicted on her; as Moses had commanded that such criminals should be stoned. The law doomed both the adulterer and adulteress "to be put to death;" but these scribes and Pharisees showed their partiality, by prosecuting the woman and letting the man escape. In a case nearly parallel, stoning was specified; and Rabbi 12 ¶ Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, [r]I am the Light of the world: he that followeth me [s]shall not walk in darkness, but [t]shall have the light of life.

13 The Pharisees therefore said unto him, [u]Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true.

14 Jesus answered and said unto them, Though I bear record of myself, [x]yet my record is true: [y]for I know whence I came, and whither I go, [z]but ye cannot tell whence I come, and whither I go.

15 Ye [a]judge after the flesh; [b]I judge no man.

this had become the general punishment of all convicted of adultery. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Lev. 20:10—19. Deut. 22:13—21. Ez. 23:43—49.) The scribes and Pharisees, however, concluded from many parts of our Lord's doctrine, that he deemed himself authorized to alter or abrogate the appointments of Moses: and therefore they desired his opinion. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:3—9.) But, if he had ordered them to execute the law, they would doubtless have accused him to the Romans of assuming a judicial authority, independent of their government: had he directed them to set her at liberty, they would have represented him to the people as an enemy to the law, and the patron of the most infamous characters: and had he referred them to the Roman authority, they would have accused him to the multitude, as a betrayer of their liberties. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Matt. 22:15—22.) Indeed they seem to have concluded, that he must, inevitably, either render himself obnoxious to the Romans, or unpopular among the Jews, by his answer to this insidious question: and in either case, it would have facilitated the execution of their purpose in putting him to death. But he saw the wickedness of their hearts; and therefore he stooped down, as if he had not regarded them. Perhaps he wrote with his finger in the dust, the sentence which he afterwards spake. Some think, that he meant to teach them in this manner, that they ought to decide such matters by the written word; and others, that he intimated that such base hypocrites should "be written in the earth." (Jer. 17:13.) But these are mere conjectures.—'To be willing to be ignorant of what our great Master has thought fit to conceal, is no inconsiderable part of Christian learning.' Doddridge.—His apparent backwardness, however, to interfere, rendered the scribes the more urgent in their demand: and therefore at length, he lifting up himself, abruptly ordered that man who was "without sin among them" to begin the execution of the criminal, by first casting a stone at her. (Marg. Ref. g—k.) It was appointed by the law, that the accuser should thus lead the way, in putting the condemned person to death: (Note, Deut. 17:2—7.) the whole company that brought this woman were her accusers: but it would have been unsuitable for any one of them, who was conscious of secret flagrant wickedness, to have begun this severity; and therefore he required that person to do it, who was conscious of his own innocence.—Our Lord assuredly did not mean, that no man ought to act as judge or witness in a criminal cause, who is not wholly exempt from sin in his own conduct; because that would disannul civil government, which is "the ordinance of God." But he knew the concealed iniquities of these men: and, by thus appealing to their consciences in respect of themselves, he made them sensible of the impropriety of their taking an active part in this prosecution. A divine power doubtless attended his word, and a new conviction of guilt seized on them, which for the present disarmed their malice: and, perhaps, fearing lest he should more openly and explicitly mention the particular crimes of which they severally were conscious; they took the opportunity, whilst he again stooped down, to withdraw silently and singly; the eldest of the company, being most deeply alarmed, departing first, and the others following his example. Thus they were sent away, in disgrace and self-condemned, so that Jesus was left alone: that is, none remained with him of that company, save the woman, who stood in the midst of the court, where the people were assembled to attend on his doctrine; and there she waited to hear what sentence he would pass upon her. But, having baffled the designs of his enemies, he declined all interference with the magistrate's office, and gave her permission to depart; exhorting her at the same time not to repeat her crime, or return to any of her former wickednesses.—There is no decisive proof that she was a true penitent; for our Lord in saying, "Neither do I condemn thee," spake only of condemnation to death according to the judicial law; (Marg. Ref. l—o. Notes, 18:33—36. Luke 12:13,14.) and the exhortation, "Sin no more," was a direct and strong condemnation of her conduct: (Marg. Ref. p. Note, 5:10—14.) yet if these remarkable circumstances were the means of her being converted, pardoned, and saved; it would appear peculiarly suited to the design of him who "came, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."—No conclusive argument can hence be drawn, concerning the punishment of adultery under the Christian dispensation: and doubtless it is absurd, that this crime should escape almost without any legal censure; when theft in many cases is punished with disproportionate severity.—The first eleven verses of this chapter, and the last verse of the preceding chapter, are wanting in many ancient copies and manuscripts; and several learned men have, on that ground, questioned whether the passage be genuine. But others, who have most fully examined the subject, are satisfied that they are indeed a part of the apostolical narrative; and the objections made to it are evidently grounded on prejudice and misapprehension. Some have considered these misapprehensions, (or rather, the expressions which give occasion to them,) as internal evidence against the genuineness of the passage. But it appears to me, that the internal evidence of its being genuine, is sufficient to counterpoise far more external evidence to the contrary, than can be urged against it. Every circumstance is completely in character; and exactly what might have been expected from the scribes and Pharisees, and from our Lord; and consentaneous with several other snares laid for him, and his method of avoiding them. The manner of the narrative is the plain simple manner of the evangelist; and the answer of our Lord, though perfectly suited to the purpose, would scarcely ever have been thought of by human sagacity. In short, it does not appear to me, that all the critics who have argued this point, (among whom are some of high respectability and undoubted piety,) could, if combined together, have framed so singular an anecdote, or one so interesting and instructive.—'The notice that Eusebius, and other ancient writers, have taken of the dubiousness of this passage, with a few other instances of a like nature, shows the critical exactness with which they examined into the genuineness of the several parts of the New Testament; and so on the whole, strengthens the evidence of Christianity.' Doddridge.

V. 12. After this interruption, our Lord proceeded to instruct the multitudes: and the sun being perhaps at this time just risen, he thence took occasion to declare himself to be "the Light of the world." (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 1:4—9. 12:34—36,44—50. Mal. 4:2,3.) Christ is to men in general, as to the concerns of their souls, what the sun is in respect of their temporal life: he is the Source and Fountain of all spiritual knowledge and wisdom, by which any man ever did, or ever shall, obtain the favour of God, acceptably do his will, and enjoy eternal felicity. All other lights must be either typical, derived, or deluding. Those who have taught the same truths, have in their measure reflected his light: they, who have taught opposite opinions, have deceived men, with a false glare of supposed science, into the pit of destruction. (Notes, Is. 8:20. Matt. 6:22,23. Col. 2:1—9. He, "the Sun of Righteousness," had with his dawning beams afforded a degree of light to preceding generations: but he was now risen; and he called upon the Jews to make use of his clearer light, in preference to that of the Mosaic dispensation, and in opposition to the instructions of false teachers, or of any of those however distinguished who pretended to illuminate mankind; at the same time he assured them, that no one, who received his doctrine, obeyed his word, and followed him as his true disciple, should continue in ignorance, error, uncertainty, iniquity, or misery, however deeply he had before been involved in this complicated darkness. On the contrary, he should certainly, though in general gradually, be illuminated in the clear knowledge of God, and of every thing pertaining to acceptance, peace, and holiness; that so he might possess that divine light which guides men safely and comfortably through this world of sin and sorrow, to the everlasting felicity of heaven. brethren, as well as at the intimation of the preceding words,) observed that as "he bare witness to himself," his testimony ought to be considered as false, or invalid, according to the common rule of judgment in such cases. To this he answered, that this rule did not apply to him; as he knew perfectly whence he came, and whither he was about to go; of which they were entirely ignorant.—He had before shown them, that God had in various ways borne witness to him: (Marg. Ref. u—z. Note, 5:31—38.) yet they spake as if there had been no other proof of his being the Messiah, than his own word; as a mere man, like other men, not giving any adequate proof of his divine mission, or the high claims which he advanced of dignity and authority.—'My coming from heaven on an embassy to you, . . . and that testified by the Spirit to John Baptist, and by John Baptist to you, . . . gives a validity to my testimony; and joins God the Father himself in the testimony with me. And as the Holy Ghost has testified that I am sent by God; so my ascension to heaven, (which will sufficiently prove my mission,) being known to me beforehand, though not to you; and being discoverable by the event to you also; . . . it will follow, that my testimony of myself is authentic and valid.' Hammond.—'As I spake from my own certain knowledge, and I have already shown that I come with a divine commission, my testimony is perfectly true. I well know from whence I come, and whither I go; and the most evident demonstrations of it have been given to you, both in the nature of my doctrine, and in the miracles which I have wrought among you: but you are so perverse, that as often as I have hinted or declared it, you know not to this day, from whence I come, and whither I am going; which is not to be ascribed to the want of sufficient evidence, but merely to the force of your own prejudices: for you judge according to the maxims of flesh and sense, and will believe nothing in opposition to those principles which ye have so rashly imbibed; and by this means are justly liable to condemnation.' Doddridge. The consciousness of our Lord to his own divine dignity, and the foresight of his ascension and mediatorial exaltation, could not be adduced, strictly speaking, as an argument in proof of the validity of his testimony concerning himself, for the conviction of others: but it was proper, that he should speak in this manner concerning his own Deity and authority: and his words being confirmed by miracles, and other sufficient proofs, would not fail to make a deep impression on numbers, leading them to a more careful consideration of the subject, and fully satisfying all who were candid and teachable; while the event would effectually confute gainsayers, and still more illustrate the great doctrines concerning his person and salvation. As, however, he meant afterwards to recur to this, he seems to have waved the further discussion of it for the present, and only observed that the Pharisees were incompetent judges in such a cause: for they were ignorant of him, as "coming down from heaven," and about shortly to return thither; nay, they were unacquainted even with the place of his nativity as man: and moreover they were so blinded by their carnal prejudices and expectations of a Messiah, that they judged of his pretensions "according to the flesh," without any relish for the spiritual excellency of his character and doctrine, or desire of the real blessings of his kingdom. (Notes, Matt. 16:21—23. Rom. 8:5—9. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) He came, however, among them as a Saviour, and did not mean at that time to denounce sentence, or execute vengeance, on any man; of which he had given them a proof in his refusal to pass sentence on the woman taken in adultery. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 3:17,18.) Yet if he had assumed this character, he should certainly have judged with infallible equity and truth; as his union of nature, counsel, and operation, with the Father, who sent him and was with him, must exclude all possibility of error or injustice. Though our Lord did not as a Judge formally pronounce, and so proceed to execute, the sentence of condemnation on the scribes and Pharisees; yet he had clearly shown them what opinion he formed of their character and conduct; which the event, and especially the day of judgment, would prove to have been just and well grounded. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)

V. 17—20. The law of which the Pharisees professed to be so tenacious, admitted the evidence of "two men" as a sufficient proof of any fact; though the Scriptures every where described mankind, as prone to deceive and liable to be deceived. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Deut. 17:2—7. 19:15—21.) Jesus therefore observed, that he was one competent witness concerning his own nature and mission; (for he spake as a prophet declaring his mission, and not as a criminal who might not testify in his own cause;) and his Father was a second unexceptionable witness to him. Doubtless he referred to his own miracles, to the voice from heaven, and the fulfilment of ancient prophecies, by which it was proved that he was "the Son of God." But the Jews, either did not understand his meaning, or were unwilling fairly to meet the argument; and therefore they inquired who his father was. He did not, however, see good to give them an explicit answer; but only declared that they "did not know either him or his Father." Indeed, had they acknowledged him in his divine person and mediatorial work, they would have discovered his Father's glory as shining forth in him; and thus have attained a spiritual and experimental knowledge of the Father also: for, as he afterwards said more expressly, "he who hath seen me hath seen the Father;" and "I and the Father are One." (*Marg. V. 21—26. (Note, 7:31—36.) Our Lord next warned the unbelieving Jews of their guilt and danger, more plainly than before. He informed them, that he should speedily withdraw from them; and that, in their approaching miseries, they would desire the coming of the Messiah to redeem them; (for he was indeed that great Deliverer, though they would not believe it;) and in this vain expectation they would "perish in their sins;" (or, "in their sin," of rejecting the promised Messiah:) for they would by no means be able to come to that place whither he was going. This appeared so strange to the Jews, who thought of nothing but this present world, that they perversely and scornfully inquired of each other, whether he meant to murder himself, in order to get out of their reach; as he so decidedly declared that they could not follow him. In answer to this most absurd and malignant reflection, Jesus observed to them, that they were both earthly in their original, and diabolical in their disposition, and belonged to "this present evil world:" whereas he was "from above," of a heavenly and divine nature, and not at all like the men of the world in his judgment and temper; so that his doctrine, kingdom, and blessings could not suit their mind and heart. (Marg. Ref. p—s. Note, 3:27—36, vv. 31,32.) So long as this contrariety continued, there could be no cordial intercourse between them. (Note, Am. 3:1—3, v. 3.) He was about to return to heaven, whence he had come down; but it was impossible that they should follow him thither, or even be capable of enjoying its holy pleasures, so long as they retained their present proud and carnal minds, and "enmity against God:" nor could they escape condemnation, unless they believed him to be the promised Messiah.—Some think that in the expression "I am He, (of which the latter word is not in the original,) our Lord meant to avow himself the great I AM, who spake to Moses. Another passage indeed in this chapter, is unequivocal to this purpose: (Note, 54—53, v. 58.) but the expression is sometimes applied to others, exactly as in this place: (9:9. Gr.) and it would weaken the argument to adduce it in proof of you: [a]but he that sent me is true; [b]and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of him.

27 They [c]understood not that he spake to them of the Father.

28 Then said Jesus unto them, [d]When ye have lifted up the Son of man, [e]then shall ye know that I am he, [f]and that I do nothing of myself; [g]but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things.

29 And [h]he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; [i]for I do always those things that please him. [Practical Observations.]

30 As he spake these words, [k]many believed on him.

31 Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, [l]If ye continue in my word, then are ye [m]my disciples indeed;

32 And [n]ye shall know the truth, [o]and the truth shall make you free.

33 They answered him, [p]We be Abraham's seed, [q]and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?

34 Jesus answered them, [r]Verily, verily, I say unto you, [s]Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin.

35 And [t]the servant abideth not in the house for ever; [u]but the son abideth ever.

36 If [x]the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. [Practical Observations.] the doctrine; like bringing suspicious witnesses to a fact which is otherwise sufficiently attested.—The Jews however demanded of him who he was, seeing he so peremptorily required them to believe in him; and his answer to this inquiry has greatly embarrassed expositors: but the most obvious meaning, and most naturally conveyed by the original words, seems suggested by our translation; as if he had said, 'At the beginning of this discourse, I told you, that I am "the Light of the World;" and if you believe on me as such, you will gradually know more of my person and doctrine.' (Note, 12.) This was equivalent to informing them that he was the Messiah, or the Son of God.—He added, that he had much more to say to them concerning himself and his salvation, as well as about their guilt and danger, and the vengeance which was to be executed on their nation: but his Father, who sent him, being true and faithful, would certainly fulfil all his ancient promises and threatenings respecting them, and attest the doctrine which he taught them: for he only spake to the world the doctrine which he had received from the Father.—Die in your sins. (24) 'As wanting that faith in me, which can alone procure the pardon of them.' Whitby. They scornfully inquired, whether Jesus intended to murder himself; and he showed them, that by rejecting him, they would murder their own souls! (Notes, Prov. 8:36. Ez. 18:25—32.) "To die in sin" is to die unpardoned, unchanged, under the wrath of God, and a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction. (*Marg. V. 27—29. Notwithstanding the explicit manner in which Jesus spake of his Father, the Pharisees, being blinded by their prejudices, did not understand that he meant the God, whom they worshipped as the Father and Creator of heaven and earth, and called their Father. (41) He therefore further observed, referring to his crucifixion, that "when they had lifted up" him, "the Son of Man," (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 3:14,15. 12:27—33, v. 32.) they would know that he was their promised Messiah, and that he had done and taught nothing of himself, from any motive, or by any will, distinct from that of his Father; (Note, 5:19.) who did not leave him alone, but continued to be, and to work, in and with him, as it was evinced by his numerous and beneficent miracles: (Notes, 3:1,2. 5:31—38, vv. 36,37. 14:7—14, vv. 10,11. 16:31—33.) for all which he said and did at all times, most perfectly pleased the Father, by fulfilling his eternal purposes, and displaying his glory. (Marg. Ref. e—i.)—Numbers who then opposed Jesus, afterwards embraced Christianity, after the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples; and very large multitudes were, by the awful judgments of God on the nation, convinced that Jesus was the promised Messiah. "The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth." (Notes, Ps. 9:15,16. Ez. 28:21—23. 33:24—29.)

That please him. (29) Τα αρεστα αυτῳ. Acts 6:2. 12:3. 1 John 3:22. Ab αρεσκω, placeo. Ευαρεστος, Rom. 12:1,2, et al. Many others have done and do things pleasing to God; but they confess, as with one voice, that "in many things we offend all." Who, except Jesus, ever did or could truly say, "I always do the things which please him?" Of whom else do prophets and apostles speak in such terms? yet this is their uniform testimony to Jesus; who is thus emphatically distinguished from all others of the sons of Adam.

V. 30—36. The dignity and energy attending the words of our Lord on this occasion, convinced many of his hearers that he was the Messiah, and they professed to believe in him. Directing, therefore, his discourse to them, he exhorted and encouraged them to "continue in his word;" or to a persevering attendance on his instructions, belief of his declarations, reliance on his promises, and obedience to his commandments; notwithstanding all the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, 15:3—8. Acts 11:23,24.) If they did this, they would approve themselves his disciples truly, and not only in name and temporary profession: and by the constant teaching of his word and Spirit, their prejudices would be removed, their mistakes rectified, their views enlarged, and their doubts and uncertainties precluded; so that they would know the divine truth and excellency of his doctrine, and be able to distinguish it from every specious delusion. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 7:14—17. Prov. 4:18,19. Hos. 6:1—3, v. 3.) Thus they would effectually learn where their hope and strength lay; and so be made free from the bondage of sin and Satan; from the love of the world and the fear of men; from enslaving attachments to traditional superstitions; from the yoke of the ceremonial law; from legal terrors and the "spirit of bondage;" and from the dread of death, and the condemnation due to their sins. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Rom. 6:16—23. 8:3,4. Gal. 5:1—6, v. 1. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) In this way they would possess the greatest possible liberty in the willing delightful service and worship of God, and in the enjoyment of his favour. (Notes, Is. 61:1—3. Luke 4:16—22. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Gal. 5:13—15.) His hearers, however, were at that time very far from thus understanding his words: nay, some present asserted, "that they never were in bondage to any man." As Abraham's posterity, according to the revelation previously made by God to that patriarch, had been in the most abject bondage in Egypt; and as afterwards they had been enslaved to several other nations, especially the Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Greeks: and as they were then reduced into subjection to the Romans; it is wonderful, how they could thus flatter themselves into a forgetfulness of their former and present condition. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) If they spake of personal slavery, they certainly could not ascribe the exemption to their descent from Abraham, as many of their brethren had frequently been thus in bondage. If they meant that their political slavery was an unjust usurpation, and contrary to their right, as Abraham's seed, (which was their constant pretext for rebelling against the Romans,) this could not in the least interfere with the Messiah's restoring them to the possession of actual liberty. Our Lord, however, did not see good to refute, or even notice their vainglorious boast. Spiritual things were, in his judgment, incomparably most important: and he therefore only reminded them, that the man who habitually practised any kind of sin, was in fact a slave to that sin, and could have no right to boast of freedom; intimating that this was the case with most of them, especially of those who thus perversely cavilled at his gracious words. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Tit. 3:4—7. 2 Pet. 2:18—22.) But if, instead of being so entirely the slaves of sin, they had far more exactly served God according to the letter of the law, depending on it, and rejecting his salvation; they could not on that account abide in the family for ever, as children and heirs; nay, they must at length be excluded, like Ishmael, who was the son of Abraham by a bond-woman. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Note, and P. O. Gal. 4:21—31.) But the Son of God, who was also eminently the "Seed of Abraham," "abideth for ever" in the family as heir: if then he, as the Son and heir, made them free by his power and grace, according to the will of his Father, they would "be free indeed;" receiving the Spirit of adoption, and the privileges, the liberty, and the inheritance of children. (Note, Rom. 8:15—17.)

39 They answered and said unto him, Abraham is our father. Jesus saith unto them, [d]If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham.

40 But [e]now ye seek to kill me, [f]a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham.

48 Then answered the Jews, and said unto him, [z]Say we not well that [a]thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?

49 Jesus answered, [b]I have not a devil: [c]but I honour my Father, and ye do dishonour me.

V. 37—40. Our Lord allowed the external relation of these Jews to Abraham: but he opposed their presumptuous confidence in it; showing that this relation could not profit such as were of a contrary spirit to him: (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Ez. 16:3—5,44—47. Matt. 3:7—10. Rom. 2:25—29. 4:9—17. 9:4—14.) This was certainly the case with those who were purposing to murder him, because his holy doctrine had no place in their hearts, which were preoccupied with contrary desires and affections. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) Indeed his doctrine and their practice could not but be opposite to each other: for he spake those truths which he had seen with his Father, and was come from heaven to testify to the world; and they did those wicked works which they had seen with their father, or learned from him, acting in concert with him and copying his example. This intimation caused the Jews again to insist upon it, that "Abraham was their father;" but Jesus showed them that if they had been the genuine children of that "father of the faithful," they would have copied his example; whereas they were seeking to murder him who certainly had told them the truth, as he had received it from God. This did not at all accord to Abraham's example, who always welcomed every discovery of the truth and will of God, with humble faith and unreserved obedience. (Marg. Ref. b—e. Notes, Rom. 4:18—22. Gal. 3:6—14,26—29. Heb. 11:8—10, 17—19. Jam. 2:21—24.)

V. 41—47. Jesus further observed, that in one sense it might truly be said, the unbelieving Jews performed "the deeds of their father."—On hearing this, the objectors, perceiving the drift of our Lord's discourse, answered with indignation, that "they were not born of fornication;" they were neither the descendants of Gentile idolaters, nor Samaritans, nor apostate Jews, nor themselves the worshippers of idols; but they had one Father, even God, whose covenanted people and children they were. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, Mal. 2: 10—12.) But Jesus observed to them, that if God indeed were their Father, if they had been born of God and adopted by him, they would certainly have loved him, the beloved Son of God, "the brightness of his glory and the express image of his Person:" for he "proceeded forth, and came from God;" (which words imply something far beyond his merely coming into the world as Mediator, being wholly different from what are spoken of any other person;) neither did he come of his own accord, but as sent and commissioned by the Father, to display his glory and make known his truth. (Notes, 1:14—18. 6:36—40. 16:25—30.) Had the Jews therefore either supremely desired the favour of God, or loved his holy perfections, or sought his glory; they must have loved the character and doctrine of Jesus, and have welcomed him as their Teacher, Saviour, and King. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 21:15—17. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.) As the matter was thus plain, how was it that they did not understand his discourse? Truly, because their pride and worldly prejudices and passions closed their minds against his holy doctrine; and therefore they were determined not to believe that he was the Messiah, and the Son of God, or even a Teacher sent from him. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) In short, they were "the children of the devil," and bore the image of their father: they were therefore resolved to perpetrate those wicked designs which originated from the lusts in their hearts as excited by Satan, and were the counterpart of his proud and determined enmity to God; and coincided with his malignant purposes of dishonouring God, opposing true religion, and destroying its friends, as much as possible. From the beginning of the world, or the existence of man, that great adversary of God and of his creation, had been "a murderer," or manslayer. Having departed from his original love of truth, and his fidelity and loyalty to his Maker and Lord, by his awful apostacy; he proceeded, as soon as possible, to murder the souls and bodies of men. By his lies he tempted Eve, and through her Adam, to eat the forbidden fruit: by which he in a sense murdered the whole human race, soul and body at once. Soon after, he instigated wicked Cain to murder his righteous brother Abel; which was the beginning, and specimen, of all the innocent blood shed by persecutors ever since. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Matt. 23:34—36. 1 John 3:7—15.) He has always been the great tempter of mankind to all kinds of discords and contentions, which terminate in private murder, or in bloody destructive wars, and cruel oppressions and massacres. He prompts men to those excesses by which multitudes destroy themselves and each other; and to suicide in all its varied forms. At the same time his suggestions tend equally to the ruin of men's immortal souls.—All these murders are inseparably connected with lies and deceit: the devil first prevailed over Eve by a lie; (Note, Gen. 3:4,5.) all persecutions are excited on lying pretences, by false accusations of the most malignant kind, and in support of false religions. In a word, the devil is the great promoter of falsehood of every kind throughout the earth, and does all his mischief by it, even as God uses truth as the medium of all good to men. The devil is altogether composed, as it were, of subtlety, dissimulation, and treachery; so that when he propagates a lie of any kind, he acts in character, and brings forth out of his own inexhaustible treasury; for he is not only a liar, but the original author of all lies, and the father of all liars. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) Now it was evident that these Jews were the children of this great manslayer and liar; in that they refused to believe in Jesus, and sought to put him to death, not only though he told them the truth, but "because he did so." Their wicked hearts were diametrically opposite to the truth, which must be holy and humbling: yet if he had taught them any false doctrine, it would have been congenial to their pride and lusts, and they would have been disposed to receive it. (Marg. Ref. t.) But could they convict him of any kind or degree of sin? If not, how did they excuse their rejection of his doctrine, and their murderous persecution of him, notwithstanding his undeniable miracles? If indeed he spake the truth of God to them, why did they not believe him? The reason was obvious; every man who is born again and belongs to God, has an habitual disposition to hear his words, and to believe and obey them: they therefore did not thus regard them, because they were not the children of God, but the children of the devil, and, like their father, were at enmity against the truth and holiness of God. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Note, 1 John 4:4—6.)—Ye cannot. (43) 'Men of your tempers cannot yield obedience to it. ... The Jews ... wanted not, either natural power, or assistance necessary on God's part to do this: but only a moral power, or a mind well disposed to obey his words.' Whitby. (Notes, Ps. 110:4. Phil. 2:12,13.)

Ex ανθρωπος et κτεινω occido.—Ανδροκτονος, killer of men, is the epithet given to Mars by Homer. V. 48—53. The conclusive arguments, and severe reproofs of our Lord, greatly exasperated his opponents: they therefore now openly declared, what they seem before to have privately whispered, namely, that he was a Samaritan: one of that hated nation, or as great an enemy to them and their religion, as any Samaritan could be; and therefore equally entitled to their contempt and abhorrence. They added, that he had a devil, or was possessed by a demon, and spake by his instigation, being also enabled by him to perform apparent miracles in confirmation of his delusions. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, 7:19—24.) But Jesus meekly replied, that he had not a devil; taking no notice of being called a Samaritan, as that reproach did not so immediately affect the credit of his divine commission: on the contrary, he honoured God his Father, by his conduct, doctrine and miracles, the evident tendency of which was to lead men to worship, trust, and obey him: and they dishonoured him by their reviilings, as if he were actuated by Satan, which proved that they were enemies to God and his honour. For his part, he sought not his own glory, as distinct from that of the Father, and therefore he disregarded equally their reproaches and their applause. There was, however, One who sought to honour him, and who would call them to account, and execute vengeance on them, for their opposition to him. (Marg. Ref. b—c.) He therefore proceeded most solemnly to assure them, that if a "man keep his saying," cordially embrace and steadfastly retain, his holy doctrine by obedient faith, "he shall never see death:" meaning, that temporal death, or the separation of the soul from the body, should never do him harm; and eternal death, or the separation of the soul from God, should not come upon him. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Note, 11:20—27, vv. 25,26.) The Jews, misunderstanding this declaration, openly declared they now were certain that he was possessed: for Abraham and all the prophets had died; and was he able, not only to escape death himself, but to preserve all his followers from it? and did he openly avow that he was greater than all who ever lived before him? 'Who can promise others shall never die, but he who is himself to live for ever?' Whithy. (Marg. Ref. i, k, m, n. Notes, 14:18—20, v. 19. Col. 3:1—4.) Jesus had repeatedly shown them that he was the promised Messiah, by speaking as "the Son of God," and "the Light of the world:" and it was evident, even from their own interpretation of the Scriptures, that the Messiah was to be far greater than any one who had gone before him.—To see death, and to taste of death, seem only to be figurative expressions of the same import as to die. (Marg. Ref. l.)

V. 54—59. In reply to the objections of the Jews, our Lord observed, that if he claimed this honour for himself, upon his own testimony alone, "it was nothing," or a vain glory like that of ambitious worldly men: but his Father had conferred it on him, and testified in various ways that it belonged to him. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 5:31—44.) By his Father he meant the God of Israel, whom they claimed as their God and covenanted Friend, and professed to worship: yet they had no true knowledge of him, nor any of those holy dispositions which spring from that knowledge. (Note, 17—20.) But he knew him fully and perfectly; and if, to avoid their hatred, he should deny this, he should then indeed be a liar, as they were, when they professed to know, love, and worship him. But he proved his knowledge of God by perfectly keeping his commandments, and executing the commission which he had received from him. (Marg. Ref. q—u.) He also assured them that Abraham had greatly desired to see the day of his appearing upon earth, and rejoiced, and even exulted with triumphant gladness, in the prospect of it. The Patriarch had, by faith in his divine promises and predictions, and through types, looked forward to the appointed season of his coming for the redemption of his people, with the highest satisfaction; and his hope of salvation was grounded on the same word, but the degenerate offspring rejected and hated Him whom their illustrious ancestor had, at so great a distance, beheld with the utmost reverence and joy! (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Matt. 13:16,17. Luke 10:23,24. Heb. 11:13—16. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) The Jews, however, perversely understood him to mean, that Abraham had actually conversed with him, as a man living upon earth at that time. He was not yet fifty years old, and would he avow that he had seen Abraham, who died above one thousand eight hundred years before?—Jesus at this time was not more, on any computation, than thirty-five years of age: but his gravity, joined with his incessant labours, probably made him look much older than he was.—To their inquiry, he answered with his usual most solemn asseveration, "Before Abraham was, I AM." The use of the present tense in this connexion, and the construction of the passage, require us to understand it as a declaration, that, as the great I AM, who appeared to Moses, he possessed an underived and independent existence, before Abraham was brought into being, yea, from all eternity. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Ex. 3:14. Heb. 1:10—12. 13:8. Rev. 1:8.) Indeed the words do not well admit of any other construction, which can render them intelligible to a man of ordinary capacity. Thus the Jews evidently understood them; and therefore they were about to stone Jesus for blasphemy, without any process of law or regard to the Roman authority; their indignation was so greatly excited! But by his miraculous power he concealed himself from their view, and, passing through the midst of them without being perceived, he eluded their malice for the present. (Marg. Ref. b, c.)—Probably, this discourse left a durable impression on many of the hearers, and prepared their minds for receiving the testimony of his apostles, after the pouring out of the Holy Ghost.—'Christ here only signifies, that he was before Abraham, in the decree of God.' Grotius.—'But 1. Christ answers to the objection of the Jews, which had no respect to the priority of these two persons in the decree of God; but as to actual existence.—2. In this sense even Judas, and all the murderers of our Lord, might be before Abraham had a being.' Whithy.—Some eager but injudicious Calvinists use language similar to this, about justification, and other Christian privileges; and they are justly censured even by their brethren: because the purpose of God, and its accomplishment, are perfectly distinct; and should never be thus confounded: but one would not have expected such crude language from the very learned Anti-Calvinist, Grotius!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. In the conduct of our Lord we see an example of the strictest attention to retired devotion, connected with the greatest diligence in seizing on every opportunity of public usefulness; but we must be very careful in redeeming our time, and very moderate in animal recreation, if we would tread in his steps; and not allow these distinct, and too often detached, parts of our duty to entrench on each other.—Even Jesus himself could scarcely be more active in doing good, than his zealous enemies were, and always have been, in devising and compassing evil; for malice will convert any thing into an occasion of mischief. The ministers of the gospel, therefore, want divine wisdom and fortitude; for they will be encountered by subtle, as well as powerful opponents: yet their enemies are seldom more dangerous, than when they assume the appearance of friendship; and, in the language of respect, attempt to inveigle them, to intermeddle with matters not belonging to them, or to interfere in the peculiar

CHAPTER IX.

Jesus gives sight to one who was born blind, 1—7. The man shows his inquiring neighbours by what means his eyes were opened, 8—12. He is brought to the Pharisees, who strictly examine both him and his parents, 13—23. They are offended at him, for contending that Jesus is a prophet, and disdainfully excommunicate him, 24—34. Jesus makes himself known to him, as "the Son of God;" and he believes in him and worships him, 35—38. Christ declares the design of his coming to be, that the blind might see, and the seeing be made blind; with reference to the miracle, and to the proud and wilful blindness of the Pharisees, 39—41.

AND as Jesus passed by, [a]he saw a man which was blind from his birth.

2 And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, [b]who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?

3 Jesus answered, [c]Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: [d]but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.

4 I [e]must work the works of him that sent me, [f]while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work.

concerns of princes and rulers. (P. O. Matt. 22:15—22.)—Adultery most certainly merits far severer punishment from the magistrate, than it generally meets with; and we may sometimes state and explain the law of God respecting these things: but we should not leave our proper employment to direct legislators or magistrates, unless clearly called to that service. If any persuade us openly to intermeddle out of our proper line of duty, we should look upon it as a temptation; and we may suspect that this is sometimes done, that they may accuse us, either as ambitious men who are enemies to civil liberty, or as turbulent innovators who are disaffected to the authority which God has placed over us. We should, therefore, generally act as though we heard them not; and answer repeated solicitations by some serious address to men's consciences; thus "studying to be quiet, and mind our own business."—The prosecution of criminals is in itself a good work: yet it is frequently conducted by such persons and from such motives, that the accusers are in the sight of God the more atrocious offenders. From regard to society they cannot be wholly excluded: nor should we in any sense require too much of those who concur in the necessary but painful employment, of bringing offenders to justice; yet we may fairly observe, that he who is concerned in the prosecution of another for a capital offence, and is himself living in the practice of unrepented habitual wickedness, has need to tremble at the prospect of more terrible vengeance from God, than that which he calls for upon a fellow-criminal from human justice. He should therefore pause, and prepare for his awful employment, by self-examination, repentance, faith, prayer, and amendment of life; lest he should "bring upon himself swift destruction." But were such barriers placed around our courts of judicature; were such rules proclaimed in them, and adhered to, how would they be thinned! While many, "convicted by their own consciences, would go out one by one," perhaps beginning at the eldest and greatest persons concerned; the prosecution might be left unfinished, and the criminals be allowed to escape. Nay, if our most solemn religious ordinances could be fenced against those who are habitually practising secret iniquity, it is to be feared that the small number of our communicants would often be diminished. These reflections may convince us what little reason men have to object to the doctrine of free salvation: they only, who have always performed a sinless obedience, ought to cast a stone at the preachers of unmerited forgiveness, and eternal life the free gift of God, through faith in Christ: all else should thankfully receive their message. The same considerations may also show us the readiest way of dealing with pertinacious objectors: an address to their consciences, which calls their sins to remembrance, may render those silent, from fear of detection and recollection of their guilt, whom no arguments can reach. And though we must not excuse crimes, nor object to the infliction of merited punishment; yet we should hence learn to be gentle and compassionate, even in performing the severest offices: and ever to show a disposition to forgive, and be kind to the vilest, as we hope for mercy from God to our own souls. We should, however, strongly urge the admonition, "Sin no more;" otherwise an escape from temporal punishment can only give an opportunity of "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath."

V. 12—29. Every action of Jesus, as well as his whole doctrine, shows him to us as "The light of the world." Let us then no longer look to the schools of philosophy for illumination; and let us not implicitly follow any man's teaching: on the contrary let us follow Jesus, that we "may not walk in darkness, but have the light of life." If we have begun to attend on him for instruction; he has already in some things "made darkness light before us," and "our path will shine more and more unto the perfect day." But unbelievers "know not whence he came, and whither he is gone:" "they judge after the flesh;" yet they presume to judge him, before whose righteous tribunal they must shortly stand: whereas, they are incompetent to decide upon the principles and conduct of his meanest disciple. Such men often oppose precepts to doctrines: yet those precepts properly explained condemn their conduct, and bear witness to the doctrines which they oppose: yea, in every way God testifies to his Son, that Salvation is by faith in him alone. Those who know not his glory and grace, know not "the Father that sent him:" but, by the knowledge of the Son, believers attain to the sanctifying and beatifying knowledge of the Father also.—The Redeemer has indeed left this earth, where he was so greatly hated and despised: yet none who truly "seek him shall die in their sins," or be excluded from that place, "whither as our Forerunner he is for us entered:" but those who continue to deride his warnings, and thus prove themselves "earthly, sensual, and devilish," will die unpardoned, and perish as "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction."—But some will say, 'Who is Jesus? And what are we to believe concerning him? We allow him to have been a Prophet, a Teacher of most excellent morality, and a bright Example of beneficence and patience: nay, we admit that he was the chief of men, or even of all creatures; and we would even grant him to be something more than a creature, if we could do it without acknowledging him as "God over all, blessed for evermore:" and will not this suffice?' Let Jesus himself answer this question. Is this to honour him, even as we honour the Father? Does this answer to his being "the Light of the world," "the Life of men," "the Resurrection of the dead," "One with the Father," the everlasting I AM? (58) He, who said such things of himself in the vale of humiliation, will not retract them on the throne of glory: and they who do not believe in him, as being all this, and as more than our words can fully express, will perish in their sins, whatever they object to the bigotry of those who fairly warn them of their danger. For Jesus has much to say and to judge of them: and all shall know, by their conversion, or in their condemnation, that he always spake and did those things which pleased the Father, even when he claimed the highest honours to himself.

V. 30—36. Many profess the great doctrines of Christianity without saving faith: when we therefore see men convinced that the doctrines, termed evangelical, are indeed divine truths, we should warn them of the temptations and dangers, to which they will be exposed, that they may be excited to guard against them.—By "continuing in the word" of Christ, with an obedient faith, we prove that we are his "disciples indeed," and "have not received the seed in stony ground." Thus we attain a fuller and more satisfactory knowledge of the truth: and this teaches us the nature, excellency, Author, and means, of true liberty; and leads us earnestly to pursue, and at length to enjoy, that precious blessing. But as men are capable of imposing on themselves, through self-flattery, in the most unaccountable manner, in respect of their secular concerns; no wonder if they mistake their character and state in relation to God and the eternal world. (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.) It is, however, most certain, that he "who committeth sin is the slave of sin;" and we may infer safely, that many declaim and dispute about liberty of every kind, and boast of it, nay fight for it, who are themselves base slaves to ambition, avarice, lust, anger, or some other grovelling or malignant tyrant. How highly soever we value Freedom, personal or political, civil or religious; (and when freedom is soberly ascertained, it can scarcely be too highly prized;) we must recollect that it is a mere shadow to the slave of sin and Satan: and we may well weep to see men laden with heavy chains, yet glorying in their liberty; till death terminates their delusion, and makes them know that they must be slaves for ever. From this awful state no maxims of philosophy, no system of ethics, no inventions of superstition, no external ordinances, can deliver any man: nay, God may outwardly be served from slavish fear, or mercenary hope, and no liberty be obtained or enjoyed; but "if the Son of God make us free, we shall be free indeed," and for ever. While therefore men stand up for freedom, rights, and privileges; let every one, who would be truly wise, first come to Christ for that real and enduring liberty to which he calls us by his gospel. (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.)

V. 37—47. Alas! immense numbers boast of being Christians, as absurdly as the Jews did that they were "Abraham's children;" and they suppose that God is their Father, because they have been baptized, even as the Jews did because of circumcision. But which do they resemble most, the primitive Christians, or those who sought to murder Christ, because they could not endure his doctrines and precepts? Are they born again, and made partakers of a divine and holy nature? Do they above all things love Jesus, and his salvation and service? If there is nothing of this kind in their dispositions and conduct, but very many things of a contrary nature, let them not deceive themselves: they are the children of him whose works they do, and whose image they bear; and the pride, rebellion, dissimulation, malice, and malignity of numbers called Christians, show them to be the offspring of that old apostate, murderer, and liar, the devil. Such affronting applications of evangelical truth, induce men to complain that they cannot understand the words of Christ; no evidence can convince them, that those doctrines are true, which reduce them to the alternative, of renouncing and mor-

5 As [g]long as I am in the world, I am the Light of the world.

6 When he had thus spoken, [h]he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he [i]anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay;

7 And said unto him, [k]Go wash in [l]the pool of Siloam, (which is by interpretation, [l]Sent.) He went his way therefore, and washed, [m]and came seeing.

8 The neighbours therefore, and they which before had seen him that he was blind, said, [n]Is not this he that [o]sat and begged?

tifying every sin, or of perishing for ever in hell. The most unexceptionable conduct of those who speak the words of God, will not procure them credit, "because they tell them the truth:" but if any improbable report be spread, or any new heresy started; the same persons will embrace it with the most implicit and absurd credulity! The reason is evident; "they are not of God, and therefore they cannot hear his words."

V. 48—59. Calumny and reproach must be the recompense of those who stand up for the "truth as it is in Jesus:" and they may expect to be called the enemies of mankind, of their country, nay, of the church and religion; for, the more they honour God, the more the ungodly and hypocritical will dishonour them. Nor ought we to be disconcerted at being called enthusiasts and insane, nor even branded in more opprobrious terms, by such men as said to the holy Jesus, "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil." We must, amidst all, still direct men to Jesus, "not seeking our own glory," but leaving the matter to him "who seeketh and judgeth:" for we are assured that they who "keep his saying shall not see death for ever." We should steadfastly profess what we know and believe concerning God and religion; whatever wrong constructions may be put upon our words, by those who falsely claim him as their God, yet know him not; and if we be heirs of Abraham's faith, we shall both trust him for temporal protection, and rejoice with glad exultation in expectation of that day when the Saviour who said, "Before Abraham was, I AM," shall appear in his glory to the confusion of his enemies, and to complete the salvation of all who believe in him; while they shall shout in triumphant strains, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us. This is the LORD, we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." (Notes, Is. 25:9. 1 Tim. 4:6—8. Tit. 2:11—15. Heb. 9:27, 28. 2 Pet. 3:10—15.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. Though the first words of this chapter seem connected with the conclusion of the foregoing; yet it is generally thought that some months had intervened: for the events before recorded took place at the feast of tabernacles, but those of this chapter are supposed to have occurred at the feast of dedication, about a quarter of a year afterwards. (Note, 10:22—24.)—Jesus passing on the streets of Jerusalem met a man who was known to have been born blind: and the disciples thence took occasion to ask a question, which seems in part to have arisen from the opinion, that men in this world fare better or worse, according to their behaviour in some pre-existent state, of which they have no recollection or consciousness! Many of the Jews at that time had imbibed this absurd sentiment from the heathen: for, not being satisfied with the scriptural account of the entrance of sin and death into the world, they had recourse to this notion to solve the difficulties which they met with in the dispensations of Providence, from observing the extraordinary calamities attendant on some men, more than on others, through the whole course of their lives. The disciples therefore desired to be informed, whether this man's calamity was the punishment of his own misconduct in a pre-existent state, or whether his parents had brought it on him and themselves by some heinous crime? (Notes, 27—34, v. 34. Luke 13:1—5.—Many think that the sin mentioned Lev. 20:18. is referred to.) But our Lord assured them, that neither the one nor the other was the real cause of his being born blind; but it was so ordered on purpose, that the powerful operation of God, by his hands, might be openly displayed, in restoring the blind man to sight. No doubt his parents were sinners, and deserved far worse than this affliction: and the man was born in sin as others are: but these were not the immediate causes of this singular calamity, which was appointed for another most important and merciful purpose. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—7. Our Lord next observed that, notwithstanding the malice of his enemies, it was requisite for him to "work the works," which his Father had sent him to perform, during the short remnant of his life on earth: intimating that his crucifixion would soon take place, which would end his personal labours and miracles; as the night does the work of the day or as death terminates the services and fixes the state of every one. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, Ec. 9:10. Luke 13:31—33.) It was also proper for him to open this man's eyes, as an emblem of his enlightening the minds of men by the knowledge of divine truth. While he continued on earth, he was "the Light of the world," by his personal ministry and miracles; and he would be the same, by his doctrine and his Spirit, to the end of time. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, 1:4—9. 8:12.) He therefore anointed the man's eyes, with clay formed for that purpose with his spittle, which would seem rather suited to close, than to open them: and then he directed him to go and wash at the pool of Siloam, which, signifying Sent, might be a type of him whom the Father had sent to be "the Light of the world." (Marg. Ref. h—m. Notes, Gen. 49:10. Is. 8:6—8.) Accordingly the man, having, it may be supposed, heard of the miracles which Jesus performed, and hoping for a cure, obeyed; and thus not only received his sight, but was also enabled to make an immediate and proper use of his eyes, and so returned seeing every object distinctly: for it is a fact now well ascertained, that when sight is given, by a surgical operation, to those who were born blind; they require a considerable time to learn the proper use of the newly acquired sense, as well as great care in preventing any injury to it.—Perhaps our Lord took this method to make trial of the man's faith and obedience; or to show that the most unlikely means will be efficacious, when he appoints and blesses them.—As far as I can recollect, this is the only instance, in which sight was miraculously given to one born blind: and indeed "opening the eyes of the blind," strictly speaking, was a miracle peculiar to our Lord himself, and is repeatedly mentioned in the prophecies of his coming. It is neither included in the commission given to the apostles and seventy disciples; nor was it performed either by them or by any of the ancient prophets. The removal of Saul's temporary blindness by Ananias, is, I think, the only exception.—The same is observable also of opening the ears of the deaf, and the mouths of the dumb. V. 14. It is said, that anointing the eyes with any kind of unguent, or even with spittle, on the sabbath-day, was forbidden by a tradition of the elders: if so, our Lord might use this method of opening the man's eyes, as a protest against their absurd and frivolous traditions. how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see.

16 Therefore said some of the Pharisees, [x]This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? [y]And there was a division among them.

17 They say unto the blind man again, What sayest thou of him? that he hath opened thine eyes? He said, [z]He is a prophet.

18 But the [a]Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight.

19 And they asked them, saying, [b]Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? how then doth he now see?

20 His parents answered them, and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind:

21 But by what means he now seeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not: he is of age, ask him; he shall speak for himself.

22 These words spake his parents, [c]because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, [d]he should be put out of the synagogue.

23 Therefore said his parents, [e]He is of age, ask him. [Practical Observations.]

24 Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, [f]Give God the praise. [g]we know that this man is [h]a sinner.

25 He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not: [i]one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see.

26 Then said they to him again, What did he to thee? how opened he thine eyes?

27 He answered them, [k]I have told you already and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? will ye also be his disciples?

28 Then [l]they reviled him, and said, Thou art his disciple; [m]but we are Moses's disciples.

29 We [n]know that God spake unto Moses: [o]as for this fellow, [p]we know not from whence he is.

30 The man answered and said unto them, Why, [q]herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, [r]and yet he hath opened mine eyes.

31 Now [s]we know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, [t]and doeth his will, [u]him he heareth.

32 Since [x]the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.

33 If this man [y]were not of God, he could do nothing.

34 They answered and said unto him, Thou [z]wast altogether born in sins, [a]and dost thou teach us? [b]And they [c]cast him out.

35 ¶ Jesus heard that they had cast him out; was divided into two parties, which contended with each other, continuing in the same place. It is probable that Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, with some others who privately favoured our Lord, embraced this opportunity of checking the violent proceedings of his enemies.

It also farther appears from hence that the parents, and indeed the Sanhedrim, knew who it was that opened this man's eyes; though he himself was hitherto a stranger to him, and was not yet acquainted with the dignity of his person. (25, 36.)' Doddridge.—Should be put out, &c.] (Marg. Ref. d.) Expulsion from the synagogue was a sort of excommunication, attended with many civil penalties and inconveniences. —We may account for the reserve of the man's parents, and their declining to say any thing which might bring them into danger of so heavy a punishment; but their conduct cannot be excused, considering their obligations to Jesus, and the sensible evidence which they had of his power to protect them and do them good.

V. 24, 25. Some understand the Pharisees to have meant, that the man ought to give glory to God, by confessing the collusion, which they supposed to have been between him and Jesus, to impose on them by an apparent miracle; (Note, Josh. 7:19.) for they knew, as they pretended, that Jesus was "a sinner;" that is, one guilty of gross violations of the law, and a false prophet. It is however probable, that unable to deny the miracle, they meant to say, 'As by some unknown means God has given thee sight, render him the praise, without regarding Jesus, who has nothing to do with the credit of the cure.' But the man observed, that if Jesus was a sinner, he had no knowledge of it; and he was fully assured that having been blind from his birth, he could at present see, and had obtained sight by attending to his directions. (Marg. Ref. Note, Is. 66:5,6.)

V. 26—34. The man, on being again interrogated to the same effect as before, (10—12,) perceived that the Pharisees wanted to draw from him some expression, apparently inconsistent with his former testimony; and he was filled with an honest indignation at their excessive malice and perverseness: he therefore answered in a manner which implied that they could have no good motive for such repeated questions, unless they were at length disposed to become the disciples of Jesus. Exasperated by this intimation, which appeared to them rude and insolent, they reviled him as a worthless person, and as the disciple of Jesus, along with others of the ignorant multitude; while they gloried in being the disciples of Moses. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Note, 5:45—47. 7:40—53.) They declared themselves fully assured that Moses spake by authority from God; but they asserted, that they had no evidence whence Jesus was, whom they considered as an impostor of obscure birth and education. Thus they insinuated that the doctrine of Jesus contradicted that of Moses, whereas in fact it established and completed it: and they considered the miracles wrought by Moses, nearly fifteen hundred years before, as undeniable evidences of his divine mission; whereas they treated those of Jesus, which were far more numerous and beneficent, and at least equally astonishing, as unworthy of their notice, though they fell under the cognizance of their own senses! In fact Moses was dead; and they had learned how to explain away his meaning, and to render his writings subservient to their own ambition and interest: whereas Jesus was a living reprover of their hypocrisy, and a formidable rival and adversary to their reputation and authority. (Note, Matt. 23:29—33.) The man therefore, under all his disadvantages, being free from their prejudices, argued far more conclusively than they. He exposed their obstinate and prejudiced ignorance, by expressing the greatest astonishment, that they could doubt whence that person was, who had wrought such a miracle as had never before been heard of. (Note, 4—7.) God did not regard the prayers of notoriously wicked men; much less would he enable an impostor to work so stupendous a miracle, in confirmation of his doctrine: so that if Jesus had not been of God, he could not have done any thing of this kind. (Marg. Ref. n—y. Notes, Deut. 13:1—5. Matt. 12:22—30.)—This argument, which it was impossible to answer, and which convicted them of malice and folly excited their most indignant resentment: and being ignorant of the scriptural doctrine that all men are born in sin, they considered the bodily blindness of the man, as a demonstration, that he came into the world under the divine displeasure, and far more depraved than other men; (Note, 1—3.) and was it proper that so base and ignorant a wretch should presume to instruct them, who were Pharisees, scribes, and rulers assembled in council? Or could such insolence be endured Thus they disdainfully closed their ears to the truth, and excommunicated the man for his honest and sensible obserand when he had found him he said unto him, Dost thou believe on [c]the Son of God?

36 He answered and said, [f]Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him?

37 And Jesus said unto him, [g]Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee.

38 And he said, [h]Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

39 ¶ And Jesus said, [i]For judgment I am come into this world; [k]that they which see not might see, and that they which see [l]might be made blind.

40 And some of the Pharisees which were with him heard these words, and said unto him, [m]Are we blind also?

41 Jesus said unto them, [n]If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth.

V. 35—38. 'The condition of those persons is very happy, who are thrust out to the greatest distance by impious persons, (glorying in the name of the church,) that Christ himself may approach still nearer to them.' Beza. (Notes, Is. 66:5,6. Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—23. Acts 5:41,42. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)—Jesus, knowing what persecution the man endured on his account, found him out, and made himself known to him as "the Son of God," in order to his further instruction and encouragement; and he, who before considered him as a prophet, now believed in and worshipped him in a far higher character. (Marg. Ref. c—h. Notes, 1:47—51, v. 49. 3:16. 4:25,26. 6:66—71. 20:24—31.) Without doubt the worship which Jesus accepted from him, was at least equal to that which apostles and angels decidedly refused. (Notes, Acts 10:24—26. Rev. 19:9,10. 22:8,9.)

V. 39—41. The preceding address of our Lord to the man might be private; but what here follows must have been more open: for he declared in the hearing of the Pharisees, that, though in secular matters he would not judge or inflict punishment, yet he came into the world on purpose to discover men's secret characters, and to execute spiritual judgment on specious hypocrites. (Notes, 8:13—16, v. 15. Luke 2:33—35.) As, by his miraculous power, the blind received their sight; so, by his doctrine, the poor, the ignorant, and the simple of the Jews, and even the benighted Gentiles, would be made wise and discerning in the things of God: and at the same time, those who were proud of their superior knowledge, learning, and wisdom, and most renowned in this respect, would be shown to be blind in spiritual things, and would have their eyes judicially closed. (Note, Matt. 11:25,26.)—The Pharisees readily perceived that this referred to them; and therefore they disdainfully inquired, whether he meant to insinuate that they were blind also. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Luke 11:45—48.) To this he replied, that if they had been really blind or ignorant, by misfortune, or through want of capacity or opportunity of instruction; they would comparatively have been free from guilt in their pertinacious opposition to him: but their abundant opportunities, and their high conceit of their own knowledge and discernment, while they wilfully shut their eyes against the light, would leave them without excuse, under the guilt and power of their aggravated wickedness, and under the heavy wrath of God. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 15:22—25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. It becomes us to be very cautious how we ascribe the personal or relative calamities of others to their peculiar sinfulness: (Note, Job 2:12,13. 4:1. Luke 13:1—5.) for the Lord may have far other reasons for afflicting them; and those whom he most loves are often long and sharply tried, in order to the display of his grace in supporting and delivering them. But we can never do wrong in applying to Jesus to solve our difficulties; for he is "the Light of the world," from whom we must derive all our knowledge and instruction in the great concerns of eternity.—Let us also learn to copy his perseverance in doing good, amidst discouragements, revilings, and injuries: and let every one seize the present hour, to ensure his own salvation, and to do the work of God; remembering how speedily "the night cometh in which no man can work." (Note, Ec. 9:10.)—Those who confide in their own understandings and reasonings, and 'trust in their own hearts," are incompetent judges of the Lord's works and ways; for he generally employs such means and instruments as men despise: thus the captious and scornful exclude themselves; while the humble believe, obey, and obtain the blessing.—Those calamities, which are generally thought to be tokens of the divine displeasure, and inseparable from misery, often prove the occasions of special good, and evidences of the Lord's distinguishing favour. The man born blind rejoices, and will rejoice for ever, in having, by means of that heavy affliction, been brought to know and love the holy Jesus; in the honour of his beloved Saviour, which was thus displayed; and in the important benefits, which multitudes, in every subsequent age, have derived from the instructive narrative.—But, on the other hand, what numbers make so perverse and mischievous a use of their limbs, senses, and faculties, even to the end of life; that they might desperately wish for ever, they had born, and lived all their days, blind, deaf, dumb, lame, nay even idiots or lunatics!—They whose eyes are opened, and whose hearts are cleansed, by his effectual grace, are the same men, yet "new creatures;" and, being known in the identity of their persons, and the newness of their characters, they live monuments to the Redeemer's glory, and continually recommend his grace to all who desire the same precious salvation. (P. O. Mark 5:14—29. Note, 2 Cor. 5:17.)

V. 13—23. How perfect in wisdom and holiness was our Redeemer, when enemies, powerful, sagacious, vigilant, and malignant, as his were, could find no flaw, and were driven to the necessity of renewing against him the repeatedly refuted charge of breaking the sabbath! May we thus be enabled "by well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." (Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.)—The most illiterate and poor, who are simple-hearted, readily draw proper conclusions from the evidences afforded them of the truth of the gospel: but they whose interests and inclination lie another way, though "ever learning, are never able to come to the knowledge of the truth."—Religious persecutions can only render men cowards or hypocrites, and suppress investigation, or an avowal of sentiments: and even the censures of the church have too often been levelled against her best friends. But no terror should induce us to conceal our obligations to the Lord: and what men generally term prudence and caution, in this case, is unbelief, ingratitude, and base fear of reproach and the cross; if not being fatally ashamed of Christ and his cause. (Note, Mark 8:38.)

V. 24—41. It has often happened, that they profess most zeal for the glory of God, who are most assiduous in dishonouring Christ: "but he that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father that sent him."—When a believer knows not how to answer the objections and arguments of enemies to the truth, he may have recourse to his own experience: "one thing he knows, that whereas he was blind, now he sees;" and what he has discovered of the glory of God, the evil of sin, the depravity of his own heart, the preciousness of Christ, the beauty of holiness, so evinces to him the truth of the gospel, that no arguments can answer "this witness in himself." (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.)—How little ought we to regard the contempt and revilings of the scornful and unbelieving, though most eminent among men; when the holy Jesus was reviled by a convention of Jewish priests and rulers, as a notorious sinner, and "the Lord of glory" was disdained as most base and contemptible! But how unbecoming are such revilings, especially in those who are of superior rank and education!—Plain unlettered sense will commonly go further in understanding the most important matters, than all the advantages of science, which often render men too self-sufficient to judge aright.—Our God, who heareth the repenting sinner's cry, will not regard those who go on still in their wickedness: (Note, Ps. 66:18,19.) but when we desire and aim to do his will, he answers our prayers, and employs us in his service.—When arguments fail pertinacious disputers, they commonly have recourse to railing and abusive language: and many show their pride and folly, by refusing to hear sober sense and sound argument from their supposed inferiors, and by answering them with contempt and upbraidings. But Jesus will show himself peculiarly attentive to those who are suffering for his sake: those who act conscientiously and boldly, according to their present measure of knowledge, shall be led forward; and the more they know of Christ, the greater honour they will render to him. (Notes, Hos. 6:1—3, v. 3.) Thus the Lord gives eyes to the blind, and closes the minds of haughty boasters. Conscious humble ignorance dwells nearer the porch of wisdom, than arrogant genius and science. If a man be "wise

CHAPTER X.

True shepherds enter in by the Door of the sheep fold, are acknowledged by the sheep, and go before them; being thus distinguished from dishonest and corrupt teachers. 1—6. Christ is the Door, and the good Shepherd, who lays down his life for the sheep," 9—18. Divers opinions are held concerning him, 19—21. He proves his mission by his works; shows the character of his sheep, to whom "he gives eternal life, neither shall any pluck them out of his hands;" and that "he and the Father are one," 22—30. The Jews attempt to stone him as a blasphemer; but he justifies his doctrine, and escapes from them, 31—39. He goes beyond Jordan, where many believe on him, 40—42.

VERILY, [a]verily, I say unto you, [b]He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, [c]the same is a thief and a robber.

2 But [d]he that entereth in by the door is [e]the shepherd of the sheep.

3 To him [f]the porter openeth; [g]and the sheep hear his voice: [h]and he calleth his own sheep by name, [i]and leadeth them out.

4 And when he putteth forth his own sheep, [k]he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: [l]for they know his voice.

5 And [m]a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers.

6 This parable spake Jesus unto them: but [n]they understood not what things they were which he spake unto them.

7 Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, [o]I am the Door of [p]the sheep.

8 All that ever [q]came before me are thieves and robbers: [r]but the sheep did not hear them.

9 I am [s]the Door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, [t]and shall go in and out, and find pasture. [Practical Observations.]

in his own conceit, there is more hope of a fool than of him:" and none are in more danger than such as exclaim, "Are we blind also?" For numbers of this character will perish under the aggravated guilt of "loving darkness and hating the light, because their deeds are evil." (Notes, 3:19—21. Is. 8:20.)

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1—5. This parable is evidently a continuation of the former chapter: and therefore the false teachers of the Jews, whether Pharisees, scribes, or priests, were primarily intended, by "the thieves and robbers;" but not exclusively. From Jesus "the Light of the world," all who are instrumental in illuminating mankind derive their light: and in like manner all true pastors derive their authority from him, as "the chief Shepherd." (Notes, Ps. 23: 80: 1. Is. 40:9—11. Ez. 34:23—31. Zech. 13:7. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Even before his appearance in the flesh, all the faithful teachers of God's people testified of him, and directed the people to expect salvation, by faith in the Redeemer who was to come. (Notes, 5:39—47. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10, v. 10.) When he was on earth, the priests and scribes, if they had been such shepherds as God approved, would have imitated John the Baptist, and borne testimony to him as "the Son of God," and the Saviour of men. So that in every age of the church a regard to Christ, as the Source of authority, and the Subject and Object of their ministry, has been the grand criterion of faithful pastors.—The priests and scribes demanded of Jesus, by what authority he acted: supposing that he ought to have taken out a commission from them; (Note, Matt. 21:23—27.) but he here plainly showed that they were deceivers, who had received no commission or instructions from him, the great Shepherd and Proprietor of the flock: yet the priests held their office by divine institution; and the scribes and Pharisees were the acknowledged teachers of the people; though it is doubtful whether they were, by any divine appointment, set apart to that office. (Note, Matt. 23:1—4.) Christ himself, however, is "the Door," by whom all true pastors enter into the church, to exercise their function. (9) They believe in him for their own salvation, and receive from him those peculiar dispositions and endowments which fit them for their work: and they aim to glorify him and to do good to souls; preferring this service to more creditable and lucrative employments, and prepared to suffer hardship of every kind in performing it. Thus they "enter by the Door into the sheepfold:" (7) but all who intrude into the pastoral office without these views, dispositions, and purposes, (which are so many credentials from Christ, that he has sent the man who possesses them,) "climb up by some other way;" perverting human appointments, though good in themselves, and even divine institutions, in rendering them subservient to their love of ease, wealth, authority, or reputation; and employing the influence of rich and powerful connexions, or that acquired by natural abilities and human learning, as a passport into stations in the church, for which they have not one correspondent disposition or holy qualification. Such men, like the priests, scribes, and Pharisees, in our Lord's time, "are thieves and robbers," who enter the fold in an unauthorized manner, to fleece or butcher, not to feed the flock; who rob Christ of his honour, and starve the souls of his people, in order to enrich themselves and aggrandize their families, by that which was intrusted to them, to be employed in acts of piety, hospitality, and charity; and for the use of which they are responsible to God. But to them who enter with a due regard to Christ, and with proper endowments, desires, and intentions, "the Porter openeth;" that is, God, in his providence and by his Spirit, makes way for them successfully to exercise their ministry: and "the sheep of Christ," his chosen flock, (Notes, 14—18,26—31. Luke 12:32.) "hear their voice" and receive the truth from them. And, as in those eastern regions, the sheep, when led forth from the fold to the pasture, follow the shepherd, when they hear his well-known voice, and see him going before them; so these pastors get acquainted with the people committed to their care, and lead them by their instructions into the knowledge of the truth, and into the ways of peace and holiness: they walk before them by their example; and the people follow them with confidence, as they know and experience their doctrine to be good, and their exhortations salutary. But the sheep will not follow those who are strangers to them, to Christ, and to his truth; but will flee from them, fearing lest they should be deceived, and not finding their doctrine suited to their wants and experience, or level to their capacities; and they will seek food for their souls elsewhere. V. 6—9. Our Lord evidently meant, by the preceding parable, to expose the ignorant, mercenary, and oppressive rulers and teachers of the Jewish church, and to contrast their character with that of faithful pastors: but the Pharisees, and others concerned, were so blinded by prejudice and pride, that they did not understand the drift of his discourse. He was therefore pleased to explain himself more fully, by solemnly assuring them, that he was "the Door of the sheep." No man ever entered into the true church except by faith in him; though many others have been externally admitted into the visible church: in like manner, no man ever was a true minister of religion, who was not commissioned and instructed by Christ; though many have a regular external appointment to the office, who are strangers to him, and pay no suitable regard to him, and whom he does not accept.—By those "who came before him," we must not understand those prophets or faithful teachers who came before his incarnation; for these acted by his authority, and were his representatives: but 'all that came under pretence of being their King, or their Messiah, as Theudas.' Whitby. Or, all those who set up themselves above him or against him; who taught other methods of salvation, and presumed to intrude into his office, and to acquire that authority over the people, which belonged to him only: in short, all such persons as the hypocritical and ambitious scribes and Pharisees, who had, before Christ's coming, usurped an absolute dominion over the people's consciences; and when he came, used their influence to oppose and persecute him and his followers. These were, and all such ever have been and are, "thieves and robbers." (Marg. Ref. o—r.) Mankind indeed generally show some regard to them: but the remnant of God's chosen people, "the sheep of Christ," have always turned from them as deceivers. Indeed, as every sinner must enter by "Christ the Door into the sheepfold" for safety and sustenance; how can those be qualified to teach the way of salvation, who are themselves strangers to him, and have never "entered by the Door into" the ministry, but have "climbed up some other way?" All men, whatever be their rank, employment or character, who have not, by faith in Christ, as the divine Saviour of sinners, passed "from death unto life," from condemnation and alienation from God into a state of acceptance, and a life of communion with him, and devoted obedience to him, are still in "the broad road to destruction." That repentance and conversion, by which men pass, as through "a strait gate," from the broad to the narrow way, have special respect to Christ, in all his characters and offices; and every motive and encouragement of those who enter is derived from him. (Notes, Matt. 7:13—20.) Thus men are translated from the kingdom of Satan into the true "church of the first-born:" (Notes, Col. 1:9—14, vv. 13,14. Heb. 12:22—25.) then they become like the sheep under the tender Shepherd's care, which at night are led into the fold, to rest secure from robbers and beasts of prey, and by day are guided to the pasture to feed in quietness and plenty, and find repose, safety, provision, and consolation to their souls, by faith in the good Shepherd's power, truth, and love. V. 10—13. The transition from viewing Christ, as the Door both of the pastors and the sheep, to the consideration of him "as the good Shepherd," should be carefully noted; because it excludes that confusion of metaphors which arise from viewing him, at once, as the Door by which the shepherd enters, and yet himself "the good Shepherd."—Our Lord indeed uses both these figures, in showing his own authority, and his relation to the sheepfold; yet he does not assume both at once: but, having spoken of himself, as the Door of admission into the church and into the ministry, he here proceeds to speak of himself as the great and "good Shepherd;" even that Redeemer who had been so often foretold under that character. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Is. 40:9—11, v. 11. Ez. 34:23—31. 37:24—28. Mic. 5:1—4.)—The false teachers, before described, sought admission into the church, only that they might enrich and advance themselves; or gratify their pride, ambition, and resentment, by domineering over the people, and persecuting such as refused subjection: (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 1—5. Ez. 34:2—10.) but Jesus came into the world, that sinners might have spiritual and eternal life through him; that these blessings might be conferred upon them most liberally; and with all possible advantages, even abundantly, and by a surer tenure than that by which the first Adam possessed divine life before the fall; and that the divine life thus communicated might be maintained and continually increased, till perfected in everlasting felicity. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, 4:10—15. Rom. 5:12—21.) For "the second Adam," "the Lord from heaven," is the "good Shepherd," eminently and exclusively: from him all pious and useful rulers and teachers derive their authority and ability: him they represent as their Principal: and resemble him, in proportion to their fidelity, diligence, love, and zeal: but compared with him, they are mean, defective, and defiled, and their goodness is not only derived, but scanty, and even as nothing. Yet, great and good, just and holy as he is, he saw his sheep about to perish in their wanderings from God; and in order to expiate their guilt, and to ransom them from destruction, he not only endured hardship and encountered danger, but he "laid down his life for them," and in their stead! According to this example, his faithful servants, constrained by love to him and to his ransomed flock, are ready to venture and suffer for their benefit. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, Gen. 31:40. 1 Sam. 17:34—37. 2 Sam. 24:17. Is. 53:4—6. Zech. 13:7. Heb. 13:20,21.) On the contrary, the hireling, to whom the ministry is a mere lucrative trade, not having any real regard to the welfare of the flock, (being like a hired shepherd who regards nothing except his wages,) flees away to secure himself when danger arises, and leaves the people to be misled by seducers or destroyed by persecutors, without giving himself any concern about them. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Acts 20,28—31.)

V. 14—18. Our Lord again avowed himself to be "the good Shepherd," which has been shown to be a character appropriated to JEHOVAH throughout the Old Testament. (Notes, Ps. 23: 80:1.) "He knows his sheep:" he distinguishes them from all others; he values and approves of them; and he knows their dangers, difficulties, enemies, weaknesses, and wants: and again, "they know him," by faith and experience; they are so far acquainted with his perfections and offices, as to trust, love, submit to, and obey him. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, 26—31. 17:1—3. Ps. 1:4—6, v. 6. Matt. 7:21—23. 2 Tim. 1:11,12. 2:19.) This mutual knowledge of each other in some degree resembles the knowledge which the Father has of the Son, and the Son of the Father: for it may be rendered, "even as the Father knoweth me, and as I know the Father." (Marg. Ref. h. Note, Matt. 11:27.) In consequence of his knowledge and love of them, he was also determined to "lay down his life for them." (11)—Hitherto he had spoken of his people, as of sheep already brought back to his fold; but he next spake of those, who were his by the election and donation of the Father; and especially such of them as were to be collected from among the Gentiles. Even these were "his sheep," though at that time living in abominable idolatries and iniquities; and "not of that fold," of the commonwealth of Israel. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, 11:49—53, v. 52. Acts 18:9—11.) In due time, however, through the ransom which he was about to pay for them, he would, by his word and Spirit, bring them forth, cause them to hear his voice, take them under his care, and unite them with the chosen remnant of Israel in one, under himself the one Shepherd and overseer of their souls. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Rom. 11:1—6. 1 Pet. 2:9,10,18—25.) Thus he plainly predicted the calling of the Gentiles: to show the Jews, that, though they might continue to despise and reject him; yet he would assuredly have a ransomed flock worthy of so "good a Shepherd." (Note, Is. 49:5,6.) —To this he added, that the Father loved him especially for this reason, because he was ready "to lay down his life, in order that he might take it again," to effect the purposes of his gracious undertaking; as this arose from his zeal for the divine glory, and regard to the honour of the holy law of God. But, though he was about to die, in the most cruel and ignominious manner by the hands of wicked men; yet none of them, nor any created being, could by any means take his life from him, against his will; but he would voluntarily lay it down for the ransom of his people. He had assumed human nature voluntarily, and free from pollution. His life was not forfeited by sin, and it was his own, so as no other person ever possessed life: he had therefore a right and power to dispose of it as he pleased; and he could, as he saw good, lay it down and then resume it: and so immense was his love to sinful man, that he chose to lay it down with most excruciating sufferings for his redemption! God indeed raised him from the dead, as he was Man; yet he rose by his own power as GOD, and as "One with the Father:" but he would exercise this power according to the commandment, which he had, in the capacity of Mediator, received from the Father.—A more decisive testimony to the Deity of our Lord cannot be conceived.—It is impossible that a dead man, if no more than man, can do any thing towards restoring himself to life: and even supposing the dead person to have a superior created nature, distinct from manhood; is raising the dead to life the work of an angel, an archangel, a created being, however exalted? or is it the work of Almighty God exclusively? And did not God raise Christ from the dead? And if he raised himself from the dead; is he not "God over all blessed for evermore?" (Marg. Ref. q—s. Note, 2:18—22.)

I lay down my life for the sheep. (15) 'Nothing is more certain, than that Christ "gave himself a ransom for all." (1 Tim. 2:6. Heb. 2:9. 1 John 2:2. 3:16,17.) . . . But because the world can no otherwise obtain this salvation, than by be-

I have power to take it again. [s]This commandment have I received of my Father.

19 ¶ There [t]was a division therefore again among the Jews for these sayings.

20 And many of them said, [u]He hath a devil, and is mad; [x]why hear ye him?

21 Others said, These are not the words of him that hath a devil: [y]can a devil open the eyes of the blind? [Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ And it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication, and it was winter.

23 And Jesus walked in the temple [z]in Solomon's porch.

24 Then came the Jews round about him, and said unto him, [a]How long dost thou [b]make us to doubt? [c]If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly.

25 Jesus answered them, [d]I told you, and ye believed not: [e]the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me:

26 But ye believe not, [f]because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.

27 My [g]sheep hear my voice, [h]and I know them, [h]and they follow me:

28 And [i]I give unto them eternal life; [k]and they shall never perish, [l]neither shall any pluck them out of my hand.

29 My Father, [m]which gave them me, [n]is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

30 [o]I and my Father are one.

31 Then [p]the Jews took up stones again to stone him.

V. 19—21. The claims and intimations of the preceding discourse were so contrary to the prejudices, and above the apprehensions, of many of the Jews; that they deemed them to be the incoherent language of insanity, or the suggestions of an evil spirit; and concluded that Jesus ought no longer to be heard as a public teacher. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 7:19—24. 8:48—53. 15:17—21. Matt. 10:24—26.) But others, who yet probably did not fully understand the doctrine, perceiving that he spake with great propriety, gravity, affection, and consistency, were convinced that these were not like the sallies of a distracted or possessed person: and they inquired whether a demon, or evil spirit, could possibly open the eyes of a man who had been born blind. This Jesus had lately done; and this undeniable and unequalled miracle, so contrary to the malignity, as well as beyond the power of an evil spirit, as they rightly concluded, ought to induce more candour and caution in speaking of his doctrine, though very mysterious. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, Matt. 9:34. 12:22—30.) The Pharisees ascribed our Lord's miracles to diabolical powers; and modern Jews ascribe them all to enchantment. But these persons supposed it impossible that a demon should open the eyes of a blind man, or one born blind; and the same must be said of many of his other miracles, indeed of them all; but especially of his raising the dead, and commanding the winds and waves into a great calm.

V. 22—24. "The feast of dedication" seems to have been appointed in the days of Judas Maccabeus, to be annually observed, in commemoration of the purification of the temple, after the persecutions and abominations of Antiochus Epiphanes. (1 Mac. 4:56—59. 2 Mac. 10:5—8.) It is indeed supposed to have been kept all over the land; yet numbers flocked to Jerusalem at that time: our Lord's going up, therefore, at that season, must at least have been an intimation, that he did not disapprove of such memorials of special public mercies, even when appointed by human authority. This was in the month of December; and the portico in which Jesus walked, (probably for shelter from the cold,) bare the name of Solomon; being perhaps situated in the place where that prince had formerly erected a very splendid one. While he was there, the Jewish rulers came to him, complaining that he kept them in a very painful suspense, by speaking of himself as "the Light of the world," "the Door of the sheep," "the good Shepherd, &c." and desiring to be told plainly, whether he was the Messiah, or not. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) In fact they readily understood his meaning: but they could not form his words into a plausible charge against him before the Roman governor, as they could have done a more explicit declaration that he was the promised Messiah.

V. 25. "I said to you, and ye believed not, that the works which I do in my Father's name, these bear witness of me." Thus the verse may literally, and probably ought to be rendered; as referring to what Jesus had said before: (Marg. Ref. Notes, 5:31—38.) for he had never expressly told them that he was the Messiah.

V. 25—31. The true reason, why the Jews did not believe in Jesus, was the want of that simple, teachable, and inoffensive temper, which characterized his sheep; for they were left to the pride and enmity of their carnal hearts, and therefore no evidence could convince them: nor was there any proof that they belonged to that chosen company before mentioned. On the contrary, his sheep, being taught and drawn of God, heard, believed, and obeyed his word: they were known and approved by him, and they followed him as his approved disciples. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Note, 14—18. 6:60—65.) To them he gave eternal life; nor should one of them perish to all eternity, through any outward temptation, or inward evil propensity; neither should Satan, or any enemy "pluck them out of his hands:" (Note, Deut. 33:3.) as "his Father who gave them to him," (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 6:36—40.) that he might ransom and save them, is greater than any and all the creatures in the universe, so that none can pluck them out of his almighty hands; and as he and "the Father are One." One Being; one in essence, will, and operation. (Marg. Ref. o.)—'The sheep of Christ are exposed to so great danger from the infernal lion, (1 Pet. 5:8.) that I doubt not, but this text most eminently refers to the care of their Shepherd to guard them from his assaults.' Doddridge. The conclusion which our Lord drew from this declaration, that, being One with the omnipotent Father, he was able to defend his sheep against all enemies, sufficiently proves that he meant to claim divine power and perfection, equally with the Father who sent him. (Notes, 5:17,18. 17:20, 21.) The Jews well understood the extent of his claim: and therefore deeming it blasphemy, (as it certainly would have been in any mere man,) they prepared immediately to stone him; and their conduct forms a good exposition on his words.—The doctrine of the preservation of all true believers, from every enemy, and through all dangers and temptations, to the full enjoyment of eternal life, is taught in these verses, with the greatest decision. "I give them eternal life," "they shall never perish," or "not perish for ever." Now, if any of them come short of eternal life, and actually and eternally perish, how can these testimonies be true, these engagements faithful? Will not the Saviour's words pass away? (Note, Matt. 24:35.)—'That is, through any defect on my part. . . . O-Christ may speak here of sheep, continuing so to the end.' Whitby.—This means, that they shall not perish, except by their own fault. But if such a condition was implied, in these and similar scriptures, (which must be supposed by those who deny the doctrine in question,) why is it never once hinted? (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 5:24—27. 1 Sam. 2:9. Ps. 37:27,28. 138:8. Is. 54:15—17. Jer. 32:39—41.) In none of these texts is such a condition so much as hinted at; and in some of them, the danger arising from it, and our violating it, is expressly obviated. Can we then reasonably suppose that a condition was every where implied, a condition of infinite importance to us; and yet that not the smallest intimation of it was given in any one of them? Could this be done by design? Or could it possibly be an oversight? Or was the case so obvious, that no caution or warning was at all requisite? It was indeed of considerable importance for our Lord, in his circumstances, to declare 'his ability and readiness to save all such as should persevere in believing on him:' but his words are calculated to convey far more than this assurance; and, 'persevere in believing' must be added to them, before they can be limited to it. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5,6. Rev. 22:18—21.) And where is the confidence of a believer to be placed, that he shall 'persevere in believing?' Must he trust in the strength of his own resolution? on the constancy of his own will? on his experienced superiority to temptation? That is, shall he "trust in his own heart?" (Notes, Prov. 28:26. Jer. 17:9,10.) For his confidence, as to perseverance to the end in believing, must be placed, either on the truth, love, and power of Christ, and on the supposition that he has promised to preserve the true believer; or on his own heart, as least conjointly with Christ, if all the promises to this effect be conditional. On the other hand, if we have for a long time persevered in believing, ought we to take the credit of it to ourselves; or ought we to ascribe all the glory of it to the Lord alone?—When Adam fell, it was not against his will, or without his own fault; yet he was overcome, enslaved, and ruined, and must have perished with all his race, had not Christ interposed: and could the true believer, though by his own fault, thus be plucked out of the hands of Christ, and finally perish; the enemy would triumph over the second Adam, in some respects, as he did over the first. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:45—49. Col. 3:1—4, vv. 3,4.) Indeed, there can be no sin, except where the will consents; or any conceivable way, by which our great enemy, or any of his servants, whether heretics, persecutors, or tempters of whatever description, can "pluck us out of Christ's hand," by an act of violence, or without our own fault. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—39. Jude 22—25.) It is said, 'Where do we learn this, except from such passages as that under consideration?' In fact, we learn it, not so much from any particular text, as from the general tenor of Scripture, and our own most obvious notions of right and wrong. Man had not fallen, had he not consented to the temptation; though it had been possible to have forced the forbidden fruit on him.—When Satan "desired to have Peter to sift him as wheat," our Lord said, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." (Notes, Luke 22:31—34, v. 32. 1 Cor. 10:13. 1 Pet. 1:2—5.) His perseverance in believing, therefore, was ensured by Christ's intercession. The event was certain: but the exhortation to watch and pray was not superfluous; for had Peter regarded it, he would have escaped unspeakable anguish. Now if Peter's perseverance in believing was secured by our Lord's intercession; is it not most obvious, with such scriptures before us as that under consideration, to suppose that our perseverance in believing is secured in the same way; and that we are assured of it by express promises, as he was? that is, provided we be true believers. The warnings and exhortations which many object to this doctrine, as if nugatory on the supposition that it is true, are of different sorts. Some are suited to stir up professed Christians to examine whether they have the true faith or not. This may be distinguished from a dead faith, not only by its other fruits; but by standing the trials, which cause many to fall away, "having no root in themselves."—"Continue in my word." "Abide in me." "He that continueth to the end shall be saved." "That on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience." (Notes, 8:30—36, v. 31. 15:1—8. Matt. 13:20—23. Luke 8:4—15, vv. 14,15. 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) These guard the doctrine from perversion, and tend to exclude presumption. Others are suited to stir up believers to "give all diligence to make their calling and election sure;" and "to possess the full assurance of hope unto the end:" that, knowing their own safety and happiness, they may be the more joyful, thankful, and cheerful, in self-denying services and sharp afflictions. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) There are also such warnings and exhortations as call them to the use of those means by which it is the will of God to preserve them. Thus the apostle assured his companions in danger, "that there should be no loss of any man's life:" yet he afterwards said, "Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved;" for that was the method, in which it was the will of God to save them. (Notes, Acts 27:20—32.) And others are intended to put believers on their guard against those temptations which, if listened to, would not only greatly distress and injure them, but also hinder their usefulness, disgrace their profession, dishonour God, and do unspeakable evil to their brethren and neighbours. Indeed, though a man could be most fully assured, that he should not be killed by falling from a precipice; there might yet be sufficient reason, to warn him to beware: for broken bones, and various dreadful effects might follow, should he heedlessly fall down, though by a miracle his life should be preserved.—In fine, it cannot be said to be impossible, that Christ should engage, not only to take care of his sheep, while they persevere in believing; but also to ensure their perseverance, and to secure them from final apostacy, or from dying impenitent and unbelieving. Now, can any man in the world possibly convey this meaning in clearer, and more determinate, and more emphatical language, than that contained in these verses, and the texts referred to? But, if any be confident that the doctrine is of such a nature, that no words can prove it; do they not "lean to their own understandings," instead of simply crediting the word of God?

From the reason assigned of the security of the sheep: the want of power in any one to snatch them out of the hands of Christ, because the Father being greater in power than all, his power could secure them from all; and so could also Christ, he being one in power with the Father: for the foundation of this argument is not, that the Father's will, but that his power was above all. 2. From the inference of the Jews, that by these words "he made himself God," and so was guilty of blasphemy.' Whitby. (Notes, 32—39. 2 Tim. 1:11,12. 1 John 4:1—4.)

V. 32—39. When Jesus saw the violent conduct of the Jews, he calmly asked them, for which of the numerous and beneficent miracles "which he had showed them from the Father," and wrought in proof of being sent from him, they were about to put him to death? To this they replied, that it was not for "a good work, but for blasphemy," that they meant to stone him: as he, who was evidently a man, spoke as if he were the almighty God. This was a fair inference from his words, and he did not charge them with misrepresenting them. (Marg. Ref. q—t.) '"Jesus" not judging it proper at that time, to bring the sublime doctrine of his Deity into further debate, "answered them," &c.' Doddridge. Viewing his answer in this light, we shall more readily understand it.—Magistrates are in Scripture called "gods." (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Ex. 4:16. 7:1,2. 22:28. Ps. 82:1,6,7. 138:1.) This is commonly explained of their authority, by which they were the representatives of God to the people: but the title is not expressly given to any except rulers in Israel, who were the delegates and types of the Messiah, the Lord and King of Israel from the beginning; and on this account especially they were thus dignified. If then there was any propriety in calling them gods, "to whom the word of God came," it must arise from their relation to the promised Messiah: and it had a meaning, which could not be invalidated; for "the Scripture cannot be broken." They were "the LORD's anointed," as types of his great "anointed One:" had he not been truly God, they had not typically been called gods. What right therefore had the Jews to say to him, whom the Father had separated, and consecrated from the beginning, to be his anointed King upon his holy hill of Zion, and at length had sent into the world; "Thou blasphemest," because he declared himself to be "the Son of God?" The Messiah was evidently predicted under this title: (Marg. Ref. b, d. Notes, Ps. 2:7—12.) Jesus was the Messiah; and therefore "the Son of God," and "One with the Father."—It is not to be supposed, that the Jews fully comprehended this reasoning, yet they understood more than they could answer. Nor would it follow from it, as it has been argued, that all who in Scripture are called gods were types of Christ: for Satan who is called "the god of this world," and the idols of the Gentiles, were not dignified with this title, as the anointed rulers of Israel were; but exposed to execration, as contemptible and hateful usurpers. It cannot be denied, that the most wicked of the high-priests were types of Christ our great High-Priest: why then should it be doubted, whether the wicked kings and rulers of Israel were types of Christ our King?—To this our Lord added, that the Jews might have some reason for not believing him, if he did not the works of his Father, that is, such as evinced almighty power: but if he performed such works, though they disregarded his testimony, let them not despise his credentials; or refuse to believe his union with the Father, and that mutual in-dwelling of which he spake. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, 25. 3:1,2. 5:31—38. 14:7—14, vv. 10,11.) This again excited the Jews to renew their attempts against him, as it confirmed their former inference from his words; but he was pleased to evade their malice at that time also. 'When magistrates and judges are in Scripture called gods, the Holy Ghost still addeth something, which excludes them from a true divinity; as that "they shall die like men," (Ps. 82:6.) or they are "rulers of the people." (Ex. 22:28.) Whereas, when Christ is called God, it is either with some epithet belonging to the supreme God, as..."God over all:" (Rom. 9:5.)..."The great God;" (Tit. 2:13.)..."The true God:" (1 John 5:20.) or with addition of some operation proper to God, as when it is said "The Word was God, and all things were made by him." (1:1.)' Whitby.—In your law. (34) The word "law" is in a general sense used for Scripture, as in some other places. (Marg. Ref. u. Note, Ps. 119:1.)—The Scripture cannot be broken. (35) This is a decisive testimony of our Lord, to the divine inspiration of the Old Testament.—Sent into the world. (36) 'It may be

CHAPTER XI.

Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, is sick, 1, 2. They send to Jesus, who, declaring his "sickness not unto death, but for the glory of God," abides two days where he is, 3—6. He informs the disciples that Lazarus is dead; and, intimating that he would raise him to life, he proposes going to him: the disciples, fearing the Jews, express their surprise, yet resolve to accompany him, 7—16. Jesus arrives at Bethany, after Lazarus had been dead four days, 17, 18. He assures Martha, that her brother shall rise again, and requires her to believe, that he is the "Resurrection and the Life;" and she confesses her faith in him, as "the Christ, the Son of God," 19—27. She calls Mary, who comes with her, 28—31. Jesus, sympathizing with the mourners, "groans in spirit," and "weeps:" the remarks of the Jews on the occasion, 32—37. He comes to the grave, appeals to God as his Father who sent him, and calls Lazarus out of the grave, 38—44 Many Jews believe; but some inform the Pharisees, 45, 46. They hold council; and concur with Caiaphas, who instigates them to put Jesus to death; while as high-priest, Caiaphas was led, beyond his intention, to prophesy concerning the gracious intention and extensive efficacy of his death, 47—53. Jesus retires from place to public resort, 54. Before the passover, the Jews inquire about him, the rulers having given orders to apprehend him, 55—57.

said of every man, that God "sent him into the world." Campbell. It is, however, not said in Scripture of any other man except our Lord, but of him frequently; (Marg. Ref. c.) and it may be questioned whether it could be said with propriety of any other man. God creates men, or brings them into the world; and then sends them, as he sees good: but "to send," applied to rational creatures, presupposes a capacity of being sent, as moral agents; and to "send into the world," in this sense, evidently implies pre-existence. (Notes, 6:36—40. 16:25—30, vv. 28—30. 1 Tim. 1:15,16, v. 15. Heb. 2:10—15.)

V. 40—42. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1:19—34. 3:22—36.) Many, who had formerly heard John's testimony to Jesus, as "the Lamb of God," and "the Son of God," and perhaps had almost forgotten it; now beholding his miracles and hearing his instructions, were convinced that he was the Messiah, and became his disciples.—John was a prophet, and more than a prophet; yet he wrought no miracles: so that miracles are not in all cases necessary to a true prophet. Indeed, it is recorded in Scripture of only a few of the prophets, that they confirmed their doctrine by miracles; except as the fulfilment of their predictions might be considered in this light. (Note, Matt. 14:1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. It is peculiarly incumbent on all who enter into the sacred ministry, or officiate in it, to scrutinize even with rigour their own motives and principles, and the tendency of their doctrine and example. By whatever external way men obtain admission into this sacred function, unless they enter by "Christ the Door;" unless their state of mind and heart, their aim and object, their example and instructions authorize the conclusion, that he has sent them; they will have a dreadful account to give of the emoluments and distinctions, which many now so eagerly pursue, or ostentatiously glory in. For it will at length be proved, that they have seized on those advantages, to which they had no right; and grown rich and great by an office in which they had neither knowledge, integrity, humility, nor industry, to do good. But happy is that pastor whom the Saviour teaches and employs; who is himself a true Christian; who regards the honour of Christ, the conversion of sinners, and the edification of believers, more than any secular advantage whatsoever; and who can say to his people, "I seek not your's, but you." To him the Lord will "open a door of utterance;" seals shall be given to his ministry; believers will approve and encourage his labours; and his work will be its own reward: while he gets acquainted with his people, attends to the case of each of them, leads them forward in the knowledge, experience, and practice of the gospel, and goes before them in every good work.—Every man, who values his own soul, should avoid those who intrude into the ministry, when they are strangers to Christ and the experimental knowledge of his salvation, and when their example and doctrine prove them "hirelings, who care not for the sheep." Indeed the true people of God will flee from teachers of this description; for "they know not the voice of strangers:" and for this they will be reproached by those who, like these Jews, understand not this parable. These very persons would think those men very imprudent, who should trust their health to some ignorant empiric, or their estate to a dishonest lawyer, merely because he happened to live in the same street, town, or village: yet they suppose it incumbent on them to follow the instructions of a man who neither knows nor cares any thing about vital godliness, if he be the minister of the parish, or of some neighbouring congregation! Alas! how much more sagacious are men in their temporal than in their eternal concerns!—They will intrust their immortal souls and their eternal interests, to such men as no one of them would employ even to take care of his sheep!

V. 10—21. Christ himself is not only the Source of authority to all pastors, but "the good Shepherd," and the perfect model, according to which they ought to be formed, and by which their pretensions must be decided. He came, that sinners "might have life, and have it more abundantly." For their good he became poor, he abased himself, he laboured, he agonized, and died! While we admire and adore his infinite condescension and compassion, and his unspeakable love to such rebels and enemies; let us inquire, which professed pastors of his church are most like him? Are they who rise from obscurity to wealth, grandeur, and luxury, by the sacred ministry; but who leave the poor of the flock, and every thing that requires labour, condescension, or self-denial, to others; perhaps without much inquiry into their principles or characters, and without knowing whether they too be not "hirelings" of an inferior order? Does this procedure (alas! too common) resemble the conduct of the good Shepherd? Or rather, is it not a perfect contrast to it? But, whatever indignation it may excite, such men must be plainly told that they "are thieves and robbers:" they only need the character of persecutors to complete their likeness to those who "came not, but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy:" and this exemption is often the effect, rather of want of power than of will. But, alas, 'such a minister carries a shoal down with him, of those who have perished in ignorance through his neglect, or of those who have been hardened in sins through his ill example.' Bp. Burnet.—Let those, however, be thankful, who have been preserved or recovered from such a state; and let us pray for others who are still blinded and deluded. Let all who have entered the sacred ministry from worldly motives, and in an unholy manner, pause, and consider their awful case; that, by deep repentance and faith in Christ, becoming his true disciples, they may be commissioned and instructed by him, to exercise their ministry in a far better manner than they entered upon it. And let all who desire to be faithful ministers, study and copy Christ's example; that they may grow more willing to labour and suffer for the good of that flock for which he shed his precious blood; that they may mortify every covetous, ambitious, selfish, and sensual desire; and lay aside all sloth, pride, false delicacy, fear of men, and whatever else can render them unwilling to "spend and be spent for the people." We all, especially ministers, should likewise have our desires fixed upon those who are not yet brought into the fold of Christ, but are scattered abroad in this evil world, even to the remotest regions of the globe; and endeavour, with all our ability, diligence, and influence, that they too may be led to hear the Saviour's voice, and become the "sheep of his pasture:" and if our zeal and earnestness, in so blessed a work, should bring upon us the reproach of being designing hypocrites, ignorant enthusiasts, or even mad fanatics; we may remember, that our holy Lord and Master was thus vilified before us.—Let sinners also hearken to him who says, "I am the Door." They can now have no access into the favour of God, or hereafter into heaven, except they believe in him. But he will admit all who come to him, and guard and nourish their souls unto everlasting life.

V. 22—42. The proud, the malicious, and all who are not the sheep of Christ, will be convinced by no evidence, and take no warning: but his sheep, when he comes forth to seek and save them, "hear his voice," and follow his guidance and example; and thus they become like the harmless, holy, patient, Lamb of God. These he knows, and they know him; they "love him, because he hath first loved them"

3 Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, [c]he whom thou lovest is sick.

4 When Jesus heard that, he said, [d]This sickness is not unto death, but [e]for the glory of God, [f]that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

5 Now Jesus [g]loved Martha and her sister, and Lazarus.

6 When he had heard therefore that he was sick, [h]he abode two days still in the same place where he was. [Practical Observations.]

7 Then after that saith he to his disciples, [i]Let us go into Judea again.

8 His disciples say unto him, Master, [k]the Jews of late sought to stone thee; and goest thou thither again?

9 Jesus answered, [l]Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, [m]he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world.

10 But if [n]a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him.

11 These things said he: and after that, [o]he saith unto them, Our friend Lazarus [p]sleepeth; but I go, that I may [q]awake him out of sleep.

12 Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep he shall do well.

13 Howbeit, Jesus spake of his death: but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep.

14 Then said Jesus unto them [r]plainly, Lazarus is dead.

15 And [s]I am glad [t]for your sakes that I was not there, [u]to the intent ye may believe; nevertheless let us go unto him.

16 Then said [v]Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-disciples, [w]Let us also go, that we may die with him. [Practical Observations.]

(Note, 1 John 4:19.) they seek his glory, and he takes care of their interests. He "gives them eternal life," and keeps them in his almighty hands to the enjoyment of it; nor shall any enemy, or any event, ever separate them from his love. "They know whom they have believed;" their "Redeemer is the LORD of Hosts." "God is become their Salvation:" JEHOVAH, Jesus, is their good Shepherd, being One with the Father, and possessing with him all divine power and perfection. They cannot expect too much from him, to whom all the prophets bare witness, of whom the priests and kings of Israel were types and delegates, "whom all angels worship," and "who upholds all things by the word of his power." (Notes, Heb. 1:1—4.) His works proclaim him "God over all, blessed for evermore;" that all men may know and believe, that "he is in the Father, and the Father in him." Modern opposers, who charge us with idolatry for worshipping the Son of God, would doubtless have dared to charge him with blasphemy, had they heard these discourses: but he will refute such charges, and silence all enemies; who can only deprive themselves of the blessings of his salvation, and provoke him to say to them "Depart from me," when he shall come to judge the world.—But he continues to send his gospel to others who will receive it. These are frequently the poor, the illiterate, and the obscure of the world; while the wise, the learned, the wealthy, and the honourable, despise his salvation: and the effects of the testimony which faithful ministers have borne to him, sometimes do not much appear, till they have entered into their rest; and then they spring up, and bring forth a blessed harvest, to the glory of God and the salvation of many precious souls. (Note, 4:35—38.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. (Notes, 10:40—42. Luke 10:38—42.) Lazarus appears to have been a young man at this time, and to have lived single with his sisters. They formed a very harmonious, pious, and happy family; and Jesus seems to have constantly resorted to their house when he went to Jerusalem.—Bethany is called "the town of Martha and Mary," because they resided and probably had their inheritance there: but, though they were persons well known and respected, there is not the least probability in the opinion that the whole village belonged to them. (Marg. Ref. a—d. 1:44.) The evangelist distinguished the Mary of whom he wrote, from others of the same name, by referring to an action of her's, recorded by two of the other sacred historians, and which he was about to mention. (Notes, 12: 1—8, v. 3. Matt. 26:6—13. Mark 14:3—9. Luke 7:37—39.) —Lazarus being ill, and supposed to be in danger, his sisters sent word to Jesus, who was at a distance, simply but affectingly saying, "Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick." They knew that this would sufficiently determine whom they meant, and comprise every topic which could be urged for his gracious interposition: and probably they expected that Jesus would come without delay to heal him. When, however, he heard this message, he said to his disciples, perhaps in the hearing of the messenger, that "this sickness was not unto death;" (it was not intended finally to remove Lazarus out of the world;) "but for the glory of God," that is, in a wonderful display of the divine power of his beloved Son, by the miracle to which it would give occasion. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, 9:1—3. Matt. 9:18—26, v. 24.) This was evidently our Lord's meaning: but the messenger would not so understand it; and the expectation which it might excite would add to the trial of the faith of all concerned, when the death of Lazarus seemed to preclude every hope.—Our Lord loved each person in this favoured family, both as true disciples, and as his most affectionate and intimate friends: yet he remained where he was "two days," after he received the tidings of Lazarus's sickness, nay, his love seems assigned as the reason of the delay: whereas we should have supposed that he would have gone at once to Bethany. But his love was directed by consummate wisdom. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, 1 John 4:7,8.)—'When God at any time seems to delay in assisting us, he consults both his own glory, and our benefit; as the event shows.' Beza.—'Jesus did not come to Bethany till Lazarus had been dead four days; not only that the miracle of his resurrection might be the greater; but also that all pretence of his being only in a deliquium' (or apparently dead) 'might be taken away.' Whitby.

V. 7—10. When our Lord, on the third day, intimated his purpose of returning into Judea, his disciples were surprised. They thought those unworthy of his presence, who had attempted his life; or rather, they doubted whether he would be able to protect himself and them from the rage of enemies so powerful and so implacable. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 10:32—39.) But his answer implied, that he should certainly be safe, and it was proper that he should be employed during the appointed period of his life; and when that was expired, he must be delivered into the hands of his enemies: even as men labour and travel securely, while the sun "the light of this world" affords them his light; but are liable to fall into a pit, or down a precipice, if they travel in the night. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, 9:4—7. Prov. 4:18,19. Luke 13:31—33. 1 John 2:7—11.)—"Because there is no light in him:" or in it, that is, the world in which he walks. The Jews divided the time of the sun's being above the horizon into twelve hours; and their days were much nearer the same length in summer and winter, than they are in these northerly regions.—'This alone is the safe and right way of life, intrepidly to follow God, calling us, and shining on our path, amidst the darkness of this world.' Beza.

V. 11—16. Our Lord perfectly knew what passed at Bethany: and he spake to his disciples of the death of their friend Lazarus, and his being soon restored to life, under the idea of his having "fallen asleep," and being "awaked from sleep." Thus he stated the fact, in language which divested it of its terror; and at the same time he spake of the miracle which he intended to perform, in the most simple and unostentatious manner. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Note, 1 Thes. 4:13 —18.) The disciples, however, did not understand him: but, supposing him to mean that Lazarus was "taking rest in sleep," and thinking this a favourable symptom of his recovery, they seem to have concluded, that there could be no occasion for Jesus to expose himself to his enemies by going to Bethany. He therefore plainly told them that "Lazarus was dead;" and that, instead of regretting that he had not been there to recover him by a miracle, he rejoiced on their account, as he intended to take occasion from thence greatly to confirm their faith in him: but it was proper for him to go to Bethany without further delay, notwithstanding the malice of the rulers. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) Thomas, therefore, finding him resolved, proposed to his brethren to accompany him; though he apprehended they should be called to lay down their lives with and for him. This was the language of cordial affection, and of some faith: but combined with great ignorance both of the power and salvation of his Lord, and of his own weakness and the deceitfulness of the human heart. —Some interpret this of dying along with Lazarus: but this is very unnatural: for what special connexion had the death of Lazarus with that of the apostles? Or what need to go to Bethany, if grief for the loss of their friend would cause their death?—Thomas, in Hebrew or Syriac, and Didymus in Greek, signify a twin.

17 Then, when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave [d]four days already.

18 (Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about [e]fifteen furlongs off.)

19 And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, [f]to comfort them concerning their brother.

20 Then Martha, [g]as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but Mary sat still in the house.

21 Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, [h]if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

22 But I know, [i]that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, [k]God will give it thee.

23 Jesus saith unto her, [l]Thy brother shall rise again.

24 Martha saith unto him, [m]I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day.

25 Jesus said unto her, [n]I am the Resurrection, and [o]the Life: [p]he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;

26 And [q]whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die. [r]Believest thou this?

27 She saith unto him, [s]Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, [t]which should come into the world. [Practical Observations.]

28 And when she had so said, she went her way, [u]and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, [v]The Master is [x]come, and calleth for thee.

29 As soon [y]as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him.

30 Now [z]Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him.

31 The [a]Jews then which were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up hastily and went out, followed her, saying, [b]She goeth unto the grave to weep there.

32 Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, [c]she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, [d]if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

33 When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, [e]and the Jews also weeping which came with her, [f]he groaned in the spirit, and [†]was troubled, 34 And said, [g]Where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see.

35 [h]Jesus wept.

V. 17—19. It was customary for the Jews to inter the dead very soon after their decease: so that Lazarus was perhaps laid in the grave on the same day on which he died. (Acts 5:6,10.)—The two days which passed before Jesus set out on his journey, and the time employed in travelling, prevented his arrival at Bethany till four days after that event. (39)—As Bethany was scarcely two miles from Jerusalem, many Jews came from thence to condole with Martha and Mary on the loss of their beloved brother, and to employ the customary methods and topics of consolation; and this circumstance was overruled to render the miracle more extensively known, and more fully attested, which was evidently one part of our Lord's design. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—27. Martha, hearing of our Lord's arrival, left Mary and the company, that she might meet and welcome him: and some think she also wanted to inform him that many Jews were present; that he might use his discretion, whether he would go among them or not. She expressed her full assurance, that he both could and would have healed her brother, if he had been on the spot: but she seems not fully to have believed, that he could have healed him at a distance, if he had so pleased. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, 4:46—54, vv. 47,49. Matt. 8:8,9. Mark 5:21—24.) She also added a confident declaration, that God would grant whatsoever he should then ask of him, for their comfort and support under the affliction: but it is doubtful whether this did or did not imply some feeble hope of her brother's being restored to life. She, however, considered Jesus as a holy Prophet, who wrought miracles by faith and prayer, in the same manner that the ancient prophets had done; rather than as the incarnate Son of God, who, being One with the Father, performed his miracles by his own omnipotence.—When he assured her, that Lazarus should rise again, she expresssed her firm belief that he would, at the general resurrection, arise to eternal life; but intimated, that this could not make up the heavy loss which she had sustained. (Marg. Ref. h—l. Note, 6:36—40.) To enlarge her expectations, and to excite in her more honourable thoughts of him, our Lord declared himself to be "The Resurrection and the Life." In him, ("the second Adam," "the Lord from heaven,") and through his mediation, all the dead shall rise again: he is the Author of the resurrection; it will be effected by his power; and his salvation alone will render it a blessing. (Marg. Ref. m—n. Notes, 5:28,29. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) In every sense he is "the Resurrection," the Source, the Substance, the First-fruits, and the efficient Cause of it. He is also the Fountain, the Support, and the Giver, of Life, temporal, spiritual, and eternal; and no man can have it but by and from him. (Notes, 1:4,5. 5:24—27. 14:4—6, v. 6. Ps. 36:5—9. Col. 3:1—4, vv. 3,4.) "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;" his soul shall live in heaven, when his body lies in the grave; and his body shall surely rise again to immortal life, by virtue of his union with Christ "the Resurrection, and the Life." (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 4:10—15, vv. 14,15. 5:24. 14:18—20. Rom. 6:5—11. 8:10,11. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Phil. 3:20,21.) On the other hand, "He that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die," or shall be preserved from dying for ever: that is, the death of the body will be to the believer no more than a peaceful sleep; the soul will continue to live in happiness; and after the resurrection, both body and soul will be preserved from death and every evil to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, 1 Thes. 4:13—18, Rev. 20:11—15.) 'Therefore I, who shall hereafter raise all persons to life, can raise Lazarus now.' Whitby.—The first clause is by some supposed to imply, that the spirits of just men made perfect still believe in Christ, as relying on his truth and power to raise their bodies.—Our Lord then, addressing Martha, added "Believest thou this?" and she answered, by an open confession of her faith in him: she firmly believed that he was the Messiah, "the Son of God," and the person whom the prophets had foretold should come into the world. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, 6:66—71, v. 69. Matt. 16:16—18.) The decision with which Martha declares her full expectation of "the resurrection at the last day," is very remarkable; and shows that this doctrine was firmly maintained among the Jews at that time, the Sadducees alone excepted.—'Grotius saith, her faith was weak, because she only believed that Christ was prevalent with God: but not that the fulness of divine power resided in him.' Whitby.

V. 28—32. Martha, having confessed her faith in Jesus, and probably obtained a measure of comfort and hope from his words, returned to inform her sister, that "the Teacher was arrived" and had asked for her; by which it appears that more conversation passed than is recorded. Accordingly, she went to him without the town, where he saw good to wait for her; this being more proper, we may conclude, than by going to the Jews, to call them forth, as it were, to behold the miracle which he intended to perform. But, as they judged that Mary was going to the grave to indulge her excessive sorrow, they followed her; by which means they became spectators of what ensued. (Marg. Ref. t—b. Notes, Gen. 37:34—36. P. O. 31—36. Notes, 2 Sam. 12:21—23. Job 1:20—22. 1 Thes. 4:13—18, v. 13.) Mary prostrated herself before Jesus in the humblest manner; but she expressed herself exactly in the same words which Martha had used. (21)

V. 33—40. The very great grief of Mary, and the sympathizing tears of the Jews, joined to a reflection on the 36 Then said the Jews, [i]Behold how he loved him!

37 And some of them said, [k]Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?

38 Jesus therefore again [l]groaning in himself, cometh to the grave. [m]It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it.

39 Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, [n]Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days.

40 Jesus saith unto her, [o]Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest [p]see the glory of God. [Practical Observations.]

41 Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. [q]And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, [r]Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me.

42 And [s]I knew that thou hearest me always: [t]but because of the people which stand by I said it, [u]that they may believe [x]that thou hast sent me.

43 And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, [y]Lazarus, come forth.

44 And [z]he that was dead came forth, [a]bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, [b]Loose him, and let him go.

45 Then many of the [c]Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him.

46 But [d]some of them went their ways to the Pharisees, and told them what things Jesus had done.

47 ¶ Then [e]gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, [f]What do we? for this man doeth many miracles.

48 If [g]we let him thus alone, [k]all men will believe on him; [i]and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.

miseries which sin has brought on mankind, and a prospect of the ruin which the Jews were bringing on themselves by their unbelief, and perverse opposition to him, may be supposed to have excited this vehement perturbation in our Lord's mind: and, though he was perfectly master of all his passions, he was pleased to give way to them on this occasion: he therefore "groaned in spirit, and was troubled," or "troubled himself." (Marg. Notes, Gen. 43:29—31. 45:1,2.) And when at his request they led him to the grave, he vented his inward sorrow and sympathy, by weeping: and thus showed himself in all things like to us, sin alone excepted. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, Is. 53:2,3. Matt. 8:16,17.) This the Jews noticed, and expressed their surprise at the greatness of his affection for the deceased: but some of them, taking it for granted, that he would have preserved the life of one whom he so loved, had he been able; and concluding that the same power which sufficed to open the eyes of the blind, could have healed the sickness of Lazarus, showed a disposition to infer from his death, that there was no certainty in those apparent miracles. (Marg. Ref. i—k.)—Jesus therefore "again groaning within him," both on account of the affective scene before him, and because of their obstinate unbelief, arrived at the grave, which was a hollow place in the rock, the opening of which was closed with a stone. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Matt. 27:57—61, v. 60.) This he ordered to be removed; but Martha objected, and thus showed how low her hopes had fallen respecting her brother. Our Lord therefore reminded her, that he had told her, if she would believe, she should see a wonderful display of the divine glory in respect of her brother. This was implied in what Jesus had said of himself, as "the Resurrection, and the Life:" but perhaps he had spoken more explicitly to this purpose; demanding faith from her, and promising a glorious event to her affliction. (Marg. Ref. n—p. Note, 20—27.)—Four days, &c. (39) The word simply means, that Lazarus had been four days, or till the fourth day, in his present state, without mentioning either his being dead or buried. It is not improbable, that he had been dead more than four days. Three days seem, from some frivolous Jewish traditions, to have been the longest term, which they supposed a dead body could subsist, without "seeing corruption." Our Lord rose on the third day: but he raised Lazarus, after the assigned time was expired, perhaps to give an earnest of that power by which he will raise the bodies of those unnumbered millions who have returned, and shall return, to their original dust. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:35—58. Rev. 20:11—15.)

V. 41—46. When the stone had been removed, our Lord, with "eyes lifted up to heaven," openly addressed himself to his Father, in a manner of which we have no other instance attending any miracle wrought by him. The Jews, unable to deny the reality of his miracles, had repeatedly ascribed them to the power of the devil: he was therefore pleased to introduce this most stupendous act of omnipotence, by an appeal to the God of heaven, as his Father: thus making it undeniably evident that he performed it by power from above; and that the Father bore witness to him, and authorized all those declarations of his own dignity and authority, which the Jews considered as blasphemy. (Notes, 5:15—18. 8:54—59, vv. 58,59. 10:32—39.) Accordingly, he praised and thanked the Father, that he had heard him, in respect of the opportunity and circumstances, which had been ordered in providence for the display of his power, by the miracle that he was about to perform. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 12:27—33, vv. 27,28. Matt. 11:25,26.) Indeed he was assured, that the Father always accepted and answered the prayers which, as Man and Mediator, he continually presented before him But he made this public appeal, for the benefit of the multitudes who stood by; in order to convince them, by the event, that God had sent him as his beloved Son into the world, to perform the works, and to teach the doctrines, which they had seen and heard. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Note, 5:20—23.) Having thus spoken, he called aloud, saying, "Lazarus, come forth;" as one who had power in himself, and as "the Resurrection, and the Life." And by the same energy which created the world, the body which had so long been tending to putrefaction, was at once, as in a moment, rendered capable of reassuming all its suspended functions, and was restored to life, health, and vigour; the immortal soul having been reunited to it. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Matt. 8:1—4, v. 3. 23—27. Mark 5:35—43, vv. 41,42. Luke 7:11—17, vv 14,15. 1 Cor. 15:50—54, v. 52.) Immediately, therefore, Lazarus came forth in his grave-clothes: and Jesus, who would not multiply miracles unnecessarily, ordered the spectators to loose him, and so give him liberty to walk home; which was done accordingly. The evangelist did not attempt to describe, and it is impossible for us to conceive, the mixed and varied affections of astonishment, gratitude, and joy, which seized on the relatives of Lazarus, and the spectators of this stupendous scene. Many of the Jews were convinced by it that Jesus was the Messiah, and became his disciples: yet others of them "would not be persuaded, though one rose from the dead;" and one named also Lazarus; (Note, Luke 16:27—31.) on the contrary, they went to inform the Pharisees, that they might use proper measures to prevent the increase of his popularity.

V. 47, 48. We can scarcely imagine a more conclusive discovery of "the madness which is in the heart of man," or of his desperate enmity against God, than that which is here recorded. (Notes, 12:9—11. Ec. 10:1—3. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 2:7,8.) The rulers of the Jews were neither convinced, nor over-awed, by the display of our Lord's astonishing power which would as readily have effected their destruction, as Lazarus's resurrection, had he so pleased; (Note, 18:4—9., but they immediately called the council together, to determine what to do in this emergency. They blamed themselves for hesitating and acting without proper decision in so urgent a case; for they could not deny that Jesus did many miracles; yet they were determined not to admit them as evidences that he was sent by God. They concluded therefore, that if they did not interpose with their whole authority, men of all ranks would unite in believing in him as the Messiah, and in placing him over them as King; by which the jealous Romans would be exasperated, and, making war on them, would destroy both Jerusalem and the temple, and so ruin and enslave the nation. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Acts 4:13—22, vv. 16—18. 5:17—25, v. 24. 33—39.) Thus they argued from their own erroneous notions of the Messiah's kingdom; as if the establishment of a worldly kingdom had been the avowed purpose of Jesus! They supposed him able to work miracles sufficient to convince all the people that he was the Messiah: and yet to be unable to protect them against the Romans! They despised his mean appearance, and were ready to say, 'Shall this man save us?' But hatred of his

49 And one of them, named [k]Caiaphas, being the high-priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all,

50 Nor [m]consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not.

51 And this spake he not of himself: but [n]being high-priest that year, [o]he prophesied [p]that Jesus should die for that nation;

52 And [q]not for that nation only, but that also he should [r]gather together in one [s]the children of God [t]that were scattered abroad.

53 Then, [u]from that day forth, [v]they took counsel together for to [w]put him to death.

54 Jesus therefore [x]walked no more openly among the Jews; but [a]went thence unto a country near to the wilderness, into a city called [b]Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples.

55 ¶ And the Jews' [c]passover was nigh at hand: and many went out of the country up to Jerusalem [d]before the passover, [e]to purify themselves.

56 Then [f]sought they for Jesus, and spake among themselves, as they stood in the temple, What think ye? that he will not come to the feast?

57 Now both the chief priests and the Pharisees [g]had given a commandment, that, if any man knew where he were, he should show it, that they might take him.

holy doctrine and example, regard to their own authority, and resentment against him for having exposed their hypocrisy, were at least equally powerful motives, of their opposition, as fear of the Romans. These motives, however, were private and personal, and it was not expedient to avow them in the public council of the nation. They therefore purposed to put him to death, lest the Romans should destroy their city and temple, and ruin the nation: and by so doing they provoked God to bring these very judgments upon them. 'For this very cause, that he did so many miracles, all salutary and tending to the good of men, and with such evidence of a divine power, as was sufficient to draw all men to the faith, they should have owned him as the true Messiah: but fear of the Romans induced them rather to cut him off, and by that very act they pulled that dreadful vengeance, executed by the Romans, down upon themselves. This is the just and usual effect of carnal policy, exalting itself against the wisdom and the counsel of God.' Whitby. (Note, Matt. 27:24,25.)

V. 49—53. Caiaphas seems to have been a Sadducee. (Acts 4:6. 5:17.) He was a bold, profane politician. He arrogantly charged the whole council with total ignorance of the first principles, by which government should be conducted. Whether Jesus deserved death or not, his life ought to be sacrificed to the public good; as it was evidently expedient that even an innocent person should be put to death, for the benefit of the whole nation, and to preserve it from destruction. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—'It would appear, that some of the Sanhedrim were sensible that Jesus had given them no just or legal handle, by any thing he had either done or taught, for taking away his life; and that in their deliberations something had been advanced, which made the high-priest fear, they would not enter with spirit and resolution into the business. . . . May we not reasonably conjecture, that this must have arisen from some objections made by Nicodemus, who . . . was not afraid to object to them the illegality of their proceedings, (7:50—52.) or by Joseph of Arimathea, . . . concerning whom we have this honourable testimony, that he did not concur in their resolutions? (Luke 23:50,51.)' Campbell. Perhaps Gamaliel also hesitated.—While, however, Caiaphas deeply disgraced himself, by this most iniquitous and impious counsel; the Lord was pleased to guide his tongue to utter a remarkable prophecy, and thus to honour the office of the high-priesthood, notwithstanding the wickedness of him who filled it. For, though he was not aware of it, God by him declared it expedient that the holy Jesus should be made an atoning sacrifice for the sins of his people; suffering One for all, "the Just instead of the unjust," that by his death he might save them from perishing. (Marg. Ref. n—q. Notes, 1:29. 3:16. Is. 53:4—6. 1 John 2:1,2. 4:9—17, ev. 9,14.) Thus he died for "that nation," in general, but with particular respect to all of that nation whoever in any age should believe in him, and for all the true Israel, whom that nation typified: and so, "not for that nation only, but for all the children of God, who were scattered abroad" throughout the earth. This must refer to "the election of grace," by which men are considered, in the purpose of God, as his children, before their conversion, yea before they are brought into existence; and as such, they are in due season gathered together into his family, and admitted to the privileges of children. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, 10:14—18. Acts 18:9—11. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.)—'And not for that nation only, but for all mankind, that by the virtue of his death, he might gather together his elect ones among the Gentiles, and might happily bring them to the participation of the same grace and glory.' Bp. Hall.—'Note, the Gentiles are here called the sons of God, not that they were so at present, but that they were by faith to be made such; as our Lord calls them sheep who were to hear his voice. (10:16.)' Whitby.—'They, which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, he called according to his purpose, by his Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made the sons of God by adoption; they be made like unto the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works; and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.' (Article 17.)—The evangelist here expounds, not the meaning of Caiaphas, but that of the Holy Spirit, who spake by him: and thus this bitter enemy of Christ was constrained to bear testimony to the great doctrine of salvation through his atoning blood; even as Balaam was constrained to bless Israel, when bent upon cursing them.—The counsel of Caiaphas, however, determined the Sanhedrim to form their plan, and devise suitable measures for putting Jesus to death, without further delay.—That same year. (49,51.) Notes, 18: 10—14. Luke 3:2,3.—'The high-priesthood still continued in the line of Aaron. . . . In that year, in which Christ was to suffer for the sins of the world.' Whitby.

V. 54—57. It was our Lord's purpose to suffer death, at the ensuing feast of the passover: he was pleased therefore to retire, for the present, to an obscure part of the country, where he abode, and conversed privately with his disciples, till within a few days of that solemnity. (2 Sam. 13:23. 2 Chr. 13:19.) In the meanwhile, the Jews, who went up to Jerusalem some time before, to perform such rites as were appointed for their purification, (Note, 2 Chr. 30:16—20.) sought for him, probably from different motives: and they questioned with each other, whether he would have courage to come to the feast, or not: seeing proclamation had been made, requiring any who knew where he was, to inform the council, that they might apprehend him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Those families in which love and peace abound, are highly favoured; but they whom Jesus loves, and by whom he is beloved, are most happy. Alas! that this should so very seldom be the case with every individual, even in small families, and still more rarely in large households! Yet even this privilege cannot exclude sickness and death. It may still be often said, "Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick;" and 'they whom thou lovest are mourning over the dying agonies, or the dead bodies, of their dearest relatives:' for Jesus did not come to preserve his people from these afflictions; but to "save them from their sins" and "from the wrath to come;" and to convert outward sorrows, and temporal death, into medicines or means of completing that salvation.—It behooves us, however, to seek to him, in behalf of our friends and relatives, when sick and afflicted; and if they be true Christians, this will suggest the most encouraging plea in their behalf. But we must leave the event, in humble submission and implicit faith, to his unerring wisdom, without presuming to dictate. In one way or other, the sicknesses of those whom he loves will be "for the glory of God," and for their own good. Indeed we ought to be willing to live or die, to pass through any temporal suffering, or to part with our dearest relatives, when his glory requires it: for that cannot be separated from the real and enduring advantage of those whom he loves; any more than the glory of the Father can be separated from that of his beloved Son. But we cannot judge of his love to us by outward dispensations: "his ways are not as our ways," but infinitely above them; and he sees good to prove the faith of his people by afflictions and delays, when we should think it proper and almost indis-

CHAPTER XII.

Jesus is entertained at Bethany, 1, 2. Mary anoints his feet, 3; Judas, from dishonest motives, objects, but Jesus vindicates her, 4—8. The people resort to him, on account of Lazarus; and the rulers consult about putting Lazarus also to death, 9—11. Jesus enters Jerusalem as in triumph, riding on an ass, to the extreme indignation of the Pharisees, 12—19. Certain Greeks desire to see him, 20—22. He predicts his own death, and its blessed effects, 23—26. Being troubled in spirit, he resigns to the Father, prays, and is answered by a voice from heaven, 27, 28. He signifies the manner of his death, 29—34; and exhorts the people to improve their present advantages, 35, 36. The unbelief of the Jews shown to be a fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy, 37—41. Many rulers believe, but dare not confess him, 42, 43. He further warns the people not to reject him, 44—50.

THEN Jesus, [a]six days before the passover, came to [b]Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead whom he raised from the dead.

2 There [c]they made him a supper; [d]and Martha served: but [e]Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him.

3 Then [f]took Mary a pound of [g]ointment of spikenard, very costly, and [h]anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair; and the house was [i]filled with the odour of the ointment.

4 Then saith [k]one of his disciples, [l]Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him,

5 Why [m]was not this ointment sold for [n]three hundred pence, [o]and given to the poor?

pensable for him to hasten to their relief. (P. O. 13:1—7. Note, Is. 55:8,9.) We must therefore learn to "walk by faith," and to wait for him in patience and with persevering faith, and hope, and fervent prayer. (Notes, Rom. 8:24—27. Heb. 10:35—39. 12:1—3. Jam. 5:7—11.)

V. 7—16. When we follow our Redeemer's example of unwearied diligence in the work of the Lord, we shall experience a similar protection, as far as it is good for us. As long as the appointed but unknown days of our life continue, we may pursue our journey and attend to our duty, without fear of our enemies, who can have no power against us: but when that time is past, we must fall into the grave, and all our precautions to the contrary will be unavailing. (Notes, Job 7:1—6. 14:13—15.)—While we therefore have time and opportunity, and the light of the gospel is afforded us, let us endeavour "to do good to all men;" and let us expect death as the end of our labours, and as the entrance of our souls into heavenly rest; nay, the quiet repose of our bodies also, till Jesus shall come, and awake them from sleep to participate our eternal recompense.—But let us remember, that even disciples are dull of apprehension respecting the meaning of their Lord: and that, while he orders every thing in subserviency to the increase of their faith, he deems their transient distress a small matter compared with the durable good of their souls, and the common benefit of his people. We should therefore be ready to suffer and die with him, if called to it: but many have lively affections, and make confident resolutions, whose views are very dark and erroneous, and who, like Thomas, are in no wise prepared for the day of trial. (Note, 20:24—29, vv. 24,25.)

V. 17—27. Natural humanity may induce men to sympathize with the afflicted, and attempt to comfort them; and divine grace will always lead us to do so: yet, alas! our compassions and our endeavours are feeble, and generally unavailing: (Note, 14:27,28.) but, however the Lord may prove his people, by delaying to appear for their relief; they know that he is their only effectual Comforter, and they will leave all condoling friends, to pour out their complaints before him. How seldom have we adequate views of his power and love, and suitable expectations of help from him! How constantly is our faith counteracted by alloys of unbelief!—We are indeed assured that our dear deceased relatives shall "rise again at the resurrection at the last day," and that all believers shall then appear with Jesus in glory: yet this assurance, comfortable as it is, cannot wholly allay our anguish for the loss of those who were a daily blessing to us. But we should by no means "sorrow like men without hope, for those who sleep in him:" neither should we look forward to death with dismay: for our gracious Friend, who gave himself for us, is "the Resurrection and the Life;" and death is now a conquered enemy, or rather converted into a friend to every believer. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23, v. 22. 15:55—58. Phil. 1:21—26. 1 Thes. 4:13—18. P. O. 9—18.) Our pious friends, whose bodies now sleep in the grave, live in heaven, and shall live for ever; and they who are alive and remain, shall never die; for Jesus "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light by the gospel." (Notes, 2 Tim. 1:10. Heb. 2:14,15.)—But do we indeed believe this? And are we dejected by the troubles of life, and the prospect of the grave? Lord, pardon our unbelief, "increase our faith," and help us assuredly to hope in thee as "the Christ, the Son of God," who "came into the world to save sinners," by dying on the cross; and "to those that wait for thee thou will appear the second time without sin unto salvation." (Note, Heb. 9:27,28.)

V. 28—40. When Jesus displays his glory and gracious presence to us, as he does not to the world; we should confer with our fellow-Christians on the encouragement given us, that we may be "helpers of their joy:" and when he calls us to his ordinances, or his throne of grace, we must not permit any company to detain us. But we should be careful not to limit our faith and hope, by the scanty measures of those with whom we converse; lest we should impede, instead of furthering, each other's "growth in grace."—Our Redeemer was a "man of sorrows." In this world of affliction, he conformed himself to the situation; we do not read that he ever laughed; but "he groaned," he "troubled himself," "he wept." That sensibility, by which many are elated in self-complacency, and self-preference, while they weep for fictitious distress, but are callous to real wo, he never sanctioned. But he wept with the afflicted: and thus both encouraged mourners to trust in him, and expect comfort from him; and set us an example to withdraw from scenes of giddy mirth, that we may sympathize with the distressed, and counsel them. (Note, Ec. 7:2—6.) Yet proud and prejudiced unbelievers call far more for our compassion and deep concern, than the most afflicted servants of our God. (Notes, Ps. 119:136. Jer. 9:1,2. 13:15—17. Luke 19:11—44. Rom. 9:1—3.)—It is indeed grievous to hear men pertinaciously dispute against those truths, by the belief of which alone they can be saved from everlasting misery; and to see the world full of sin and wo, and men rejecting the only remedy with obstinate contempt.—The Lord, however, proceeds with his gracious plan, notwithstanding the perverseness of mankind: and those who believe and obey his word, shall experience the displays and efficacy of his glorious power in their behalf. But, while we expect help from him alone; we must not tempt him by neglecting the means which he has instituted, or by refusing unreservedly to follow his directions to the best of our ability. The sinner cannot "quicken his own soul;" but he ought to use the means of grace: the believer cannot sanctify himself; but he ought to "lay aside every weight" and incumbrance: we cannot convert our children, relatives, neighbours, or congregations; but we should instruct, warn, invite, and exhort them; and exhibit before them an edifying and conciliating example: seeking a blessing on all by fervent and persevering prayer. (Note, Ez. 37:1—10. P. O. 1—14.) Thus we may remove the stone, or loose the grave-clothes, though we cannot raise the dead: and if we would have the Lord do for us and ours, what man cannot do; we must diligently attend to all those things, which we can and ought to do.

V. 41—57. Who can express the majesty and condescension of our Redeemer! For the sake of those who sought his life, he veiled his glory, and in "the form of a servant," he addressed the Father before he performed that stupendous miracle which he immediately after wrought by his own power, as "the Resurrection and the Life," as "God manifest in the flesh." If he then shall please to speak, how soon can he rebuke our enemies, new create our hearts, or answer our prayers for the conversion of those around us! How safely may we trust the health and life of our dearest relatives in his hand! And how cheerfully go down to the grave, in sure hope of a glorious resurrection! Our sharpest trials will terminate in more abundant comfort, if we indeed believe in him; and they often are means of promoting his glory in the conversion of our fellow-sinners: so that, if we could foresee all the blessed effects of them, they would be causes of admiring gratitude and joy, and not of sorrow and dejection. But we must wait in faith, hope, and persevering prayer, till these happy effects take place. No outward means can overcome the obdurate enmity of sinners against God: and they, who have engaged their interest and reputation in the unequal contest, become more callous than other men. Sagacious and infidel politicians count all men ignorant and foolish, who hesitate to sacrifice honesty and justice to expediency; and persecutors deem it a public calamity, when numbers are converted to Jesus. They think themselves culpable, when not using the most decided or sanguinary methods of opposing the truth: they undertake to crush those with oppressive and overwhelming power, whom they cannot answer: they imagine that the excellency of the end will sanctify all the impieties, frauds, and murders, which are used to compass it: and they deem the life of innocent persons a trivial matter, compared with the peace and uniformity of the church; which too generally consist in gross superstition, usurped authority over men's consciences, and destructive heresies. But, while they seek to avert calamities by such means, they bring them upon themselves in the most tremendous manner.—The Lord will, however, honour his own institutions, notwithstanding man's wickedness; and extort confessions to his truth from his implacable enemies. Once, and but once, it was expedient that the innocent should suffer for the guilty; and the divine Saviour willingly died for us, to gather us, as "the children of God," from all our dispersions into his kingdom: may he gather far more and more into his church from every part of the earth! But no devices of man can derange the purposes of God: while hypocrites amuse themselves

9 ¶ Much [y]people of the Jews therefore knew that he was there; and they came not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead.

10 But [z]the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death;

11 Because that [a]by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus.

14 And [g]Jesus, when he had found a young ass, sat thereon; [h]as it is written, 15 [i]Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, [k]sitting on an ass's colt.

16 These things [l]understood not his disciples at the first: but [m]when Jesus was glorified, [n]then remembered they that these things were written of him, and that they had done these things unto him.

18 For [q]this cause the people also met him for that they heard that he had done this miracle.

19 The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, [r]Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? behold, [s]the world is gone after him.

21 The same came therefore to [x]Philip, which was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and desired him saying, Sir, [y]we would see Jesus.

22 Philip cometh and telleth [z]Andrew: and again [a]Andrew and Philip tell Jesus.

with forms and controversies, and worldly men pursue their own projects, Jesus still communes with his disciples, and orders all things in subserviency to his own glory and their salvation.

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1—8. (Marg. Ref. a—i. Notes, Matt. 26:6—16. Mark 14:3—9.) Lazarus sat at table on this occasion, to show that he was really alive and in good health; and Martha waited, to honour Jesus, though the entertainment was made at the house of Simon.—Judas was covetous! this was "his own iniquity:" and neither his professed faith in Christ, nor his apostolical office, had subdued the base propensity; which could be effected by renewing grace alone, and of that he was destitute. (Note, 1 Tim. 6—10, vv. 8—10.) Being intrusted with the scanty stock, from which the necessary expenses of our Lord and his company were supplied, he shamefully stole small sums from it; probably accounting for them as given to the poor. (Note, 13:18—30, v. 29.) And he thought, that if the price of this ointment had been put into the bag, he could have taken a larger sum on the same pretence, without being suspected: or rather, he was forming his plan of treachery, and wished to have the common purse well filled before he went off with it. More than ten pounds must have appeared a large sum to him, who bargained for about three pounds fifteen shillings to betray his Lord. (Note, Matt. 26:14—16.)—Sold, &c. (5) It is not said, 'Why was it bought?' 'Why was not the money rather given to the poor?' Probably, Mary had possessed and used several things, ministering to luxury and indulgence, before she attended decidedly to "the one thing needful." (Note, Luke 10:38—42.) She had at this time, however, no occasion for them; and had doubtless sold many of them, employing the money in charity: but she had been led to keep this box of precious ointment, it is likely, without knowing for what purpose. (Marg. Ref. l—t.)—Day of, &c. (7) 'If this ointment were laid out on a dead body, you would not think much of it: you may consider this anointing as an embalming of me.' Lardner.—'I am of opinion that Mary indeed was not thinking of Christ's death and burial; but he testifies that this had not occurred by chance; but that a spectacle, giving a previous intimation of his approaching burial, was set before them by divine Providence.' Beza.—The poor, &c. V. 9—11. Perhaps Lazarus had purposely lived very retired, from the time that Jesus had left Bethany: so that numbers had not been able to gratify their curiosity with a sight of him, till our Lord's return afforded them the opportunity. (Note, 11:54—57.) The undeniable miracle of Lazarus's resurrection naturally induced multitudes, from different motives, to resort to Bethany, to see both Jesus and him at the same time; and many Jews being convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, and the priests and Pharisees very wicked in opposing him, renounced their party and instruction to attend on his ministry: but the conduct of the rulers in consulting to put Lazarus to death, that they might prevent the further effect of the miracle, was such a compound of impiety, infidelity, iniquity, malice, and folly, as can never be accounted for but by deep acquaintance with the desperate enmity of man's heart against God. (See on 11:47,48.) They seemed to resolve that the man should die, of whom the Lord had evidently declared that he should live!—'To destroy an innocent man, without any crime laid against him, only to preserve their own honour and reputation! See here the infallible sentence of the rulers of the church.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. Note, 11:49—53.)

V. 12—19. (Notes, Matt. 21:9—11. Mark 11:1—11. Luke 19:28—40.) The testimony of the numerous company of Jews who were present when Lazarus was called out of the grave, had excited great multitudes both of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of strangers, to go forth and meet Jesus. His disciples had no direct concern in it: nay, they did not understand the meaning of his entering Jerusalem in this manner, till after his ascension and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, by whose sacred influences they recollected the words of the prophet, and perceived their accomplishment in that transaction. (Marg. Ref. b—n. Notes, Zech. 9:9,10.) But the Pharisees comparing this conduct of Jesus, and the favour shown him by the multitude, with their late edict, (11: 57.) were greatly enraged: they foresaw the entire ruin of their reputation and authority, if he were let alone any longer. Their opposition and proclamation had produced no effect: "the world" seemed to be gone after him; (3:26. Acts 17:6.) and while they were more than ever determined to apprehend him, they were afraid to attempt it, lest the multitudes should rise to oppose them. This made way for the treachery of Judas, which otherwise would not have been so necessary. (Notes, 11:49—53. Matt. 26:3—5.)—The clause in Zacharíah, "Rejoice greatly, &c." is here rendered "Fear not, &c." Had the rulers and people of Jerusalem rejoiced greatly in Christ their King; they would have had no reason to fear either the Romans or any other enemies.—Glorified. (16) *Marg. V. 20—22. 'By the name of Greeks all were called who were neither Israelites nor proselytes, among whom there were not a few pious men, worshippers of the true God.' Grotius. 'The difficulty which the apostles found about mentioning these "Greeks" to Jesus, as well as the subsequent discourse, strongly implies that they were uncircumcised persons.—It is supposed that they lived in the confines o

23 And Jesus answered them, saying, [b]The hour is come, that the Son of man should be glorified.

24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, [c]Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but [d]if it die it bringeth forth much fruit.

25 He [e]that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that [f]hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal.

26 If any man [g]serve me, [h]let him follow me; and [i]where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, [k]him will my Father honour.

27 Now [l]is my soul troubled; and [m]what shall I say? [n]Father, save me from this hour? [o]but for this cause came I unto this hour.

28 [p]Father, glorify thy name. [q]Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, [r]I have both glorified it, [s]and will glorify it again.

29 The people therefore that stood by, and heard it, said that it [t]thundered: others said, [u]An angel spake to him.

30 Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, [x]but for your sakes.

31 Now [y]is the judgment of this world: [z]now shall the prince of this world be cast out.

32 And I, [a]if I be lifted up from the earth, [b]will draw [c]all men unto me.

Galilee, and thus got acquainted with Philip. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 1:43—46. Mark 7:24—30.) They were favourable to the Jewish religion, and came to Jerusalem to worship; yet it is not said that they ate the passover. They had heard of our Lord's miracles, were desirous of seeing him, and receiving his instructions, and they respectfully applied to Philip for that purpose: but he, perhaps fearing lest an interview with Gentiles would render his Lord still more obnoxious to the Pharisees, did not make it known to him, till he had previously conferred with Andrew about it. Probably, Jesus ordered them to be introduced to him, and spake what follows in their presence; though he might see good not to admit them to a private conference.—'Because Christ when he sent them' (the apostles) 'forth to preach, forbade them to go into the coasts of the Gentiles: (Matt. 10:5.) ... they were in doubt whether such uncircumcised persons were to be admitted to converse with Jesus; and so they consult him first, before they brought them to him.' Whitby. (*Marg. V. 23—26. Our Lord on this occasion declared openly, that the appointed time was at hand, when he should be advanced to his exalted throne, to be glorified as the Saviour and King of both Jews and Gentiles: yet this would not take place, till he had laid down his life for them. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 12—19, v. 16.)—A corn of wheat yields no increase, unless it be cast into the ground; and there perish, as to its former shape and subsistence: but while this is taking place a blade springs up, which at length produces many grains of the same kind. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, i Cor. 15:35—38.) In like manner, our Lord might indeed alone have possessed his heavenly glory without becoming incarnate: or after his incarnation, he might have entered heaven alone, by his own perfect righteousness, without suffering or death: but then no sinner of the whole human race could have been saved. His love therefore induced him voluntarily to submit to death, that being laid in the ground, as if about to turn to corruption, he might thence be raised, as the first-fruits of a large increase of redeemed sinners, to bear his image, to show forth his praise, and to participate his glory. As this was his design, and he was about to carry it into effect, his disciples and these Greeks also, should be reminded to "arm themselves with the same mind:" (Note, 1 Pet. 4:1,2.) not loving this present life, when it would endanger that of their souls; but comparatively hating it, that they might secure the eternal life which he gave to his faithful followers. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 10:26—31. 11:20—27. Matt. 10:37—39. 16:24—28. Mark 8:32—37. Luke 9:18—27, v. 23. 14:25—27.) As they called him their Lord, such of them as really meant to devote themselves to his service should prepare to follow his example in being obedient even unto death, if called to it; for such servants would assuredly be admitted into the same happy place, whither he was going. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, 14:2,3. Ps. 16:8—11. Matt. 25:19—23. 2 Cor. 5:5—8. Phil. 1:21—26.) Yea, his Father would certainly reward, nay, honour in the most distinguishing manner, all those who thus served and followed him; however man might despise both him and them. —The clause, "if any man will serve me, &c." was suited to encourage the Gentiles, and all the hearers, to devote themselves to his service; and to deny themselves for his sake; as well as to show the nature of his kingdom, and the trials attending his service.

V. 27—33. The near prospect which our Lord had of his most tremendous sufferings, excited on this occasion such a perturbation of mind that he publicly declared that "his soul was troubled; and what should he" say in respect of the scene before him? "Shall I say, Father, save me from this hour?" Even his holy nature might have dictated this prayer; had he not known that he came into the world, and had continued so long upon earth, with the special purpose of passing through that season of darkness and anguish; without which all his former labours, obedience, and sufferings, would be unavailing as to the grand object of his incarnation. He would therefore in perfect acquiescence say, "Father, glorify thy name:" for he only desired to be supported through the dreadful scene, to the glory of the divine justice, holiness, mercy, and truth, in the salvation of sinners. (Marg. Ref. l—p. Notes, Matt. 26:36—46. Mark 14:32—36, v. 36. Luke 22:39—46.) Upon this the voice of the Father from heaven, which had attested him to be his beloved Son, at his baptism, and when he was transfigured, proclaimed that he "had both glorified his name, and would glorify it." (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, Matt. 3:16, 17. 17:5—8.) The life, miracles, and doctrine of our Lord had manifested the glory of God; and his death, resurrection, and exaltation, would still more extensively and illustriously display it.—Those who heard this voice less distinctly, or the Greeks who did not understand the words spoken, said that "it thundered;" as probably it was attended by thunder: others, who understood what was spoken, supposed that an angel addressed him: but none of them seemed to have understood, that the Father thus attested his complacency in him and in his whole work. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) He therefore assured them that this voice did not come for his sake, as he had always been fully satisfied of his Father's love; but for their benefit, that they might believe in him as the Son of God. For the "judgment of this world was come." Its wickedness would be proved, and its condemnation pronounced, in that event which was about to take place. His crucifixion would disclose and aggravate the guilt of man's desperate wickedness; and show God's abhorrence of sin, and the certain destruction which awaited all unbelievers. His death would make way for the judgment and condemnation of the Jewish nation and of the whole Gentile world, those excepted who embraced his gospel. His religion would distinguish men's characters, convict multitudes of hypocrisy, lead others to judge and condemn themselves; and thus, in every way, the judgment of the last day would be anticipated. In consequence of his death, resurrection, ascension, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, and the preaching of the gospel, Satan, the great ruler and prince of this wicked world, whom all idolaters worship as their god, and all unconverted sinners obey as their king, would be judged and condemned, with all his subjects; the sentence would begin to be executed in his expulsion from his usurped dominion, by the conversion of sinners, the subversion of the heathen temples, and the destruction of idolatry. Of this, the inquiry of these Greeks was an earnest; and this would progressively be carried on till the kingdoms of the earth would be subjected to Christ. (Marg. Ref. x—a. Notes, 14:29—31. 16:8—11. Luke 10:17—20. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. 1 John 5:19. Rev. 12:7—12.)—In short, "if," or when, "he should be lifted up," from the earth, to die on the cross, he would, in consequence of his atonement, and by its attractive influence, draw men of all nations and descriptions, to come and put their trust in him, to devote themselves to his service, and to follow him in the way to his eternal glory.—This not only referred to his death, but it was a prediction of the manner in which he was about to die, even by crucifixion; with an evident allusion to the brazen serpent, lifted up in the camp of Israel, that all who looked to it might live. (Marg. Ref b, c. Note, 3:14,15.)

33 (This he said, [d]signifying what death he should die.) [Practical Observations.]

34 The people answered him, We have heard out of [e]the law, that [f]Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? [g]who is this Son of man?

35 Then Jesus said unto them, [h]Yet a little while is the light with you: [i]walk while ye have the light, [k]lest darkness come upon you: [l]for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth.

36 While ye have light, [m]believe in the light, that ye may be [n]the children of light. These things spake Jesus, [o]and departed, and did hide himself from them.

37 ¶ But [p]though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him:

38 [q]That the saying of [r]Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, [s]who hath believed our report? and to whom hath [t]the arm of the Lord been [u]revealed?

39 Therefore [x]they could not believe, [y]because that Esaias said again, 40 He [z]hath blinded their eyes, [a]and hardened their heart; [b]that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, [c]and be converted, and I should [d]heal them.

41 These things said Esaias, [e]when he [f]saw his glory, [g]and spake of him.

42 Nevertheless, [h]among the chief rulers also many believed on him: but because of the Pharisees, [i]they did not confess him, [k]lest they should be put out of the synagogue:

43 For [l]they loved the praise of men more than [m]the praise of God.

V. 34—36. The people understood our Lord to mean, that he was about to be cut off by a violent death; and they observed, that the law (a general word sometimes used for the whole of the Old Testament) had represented their promised Messiah as a glorious prince, whose kingdom was to endure for ever; and from this they had inferred that he would never die: how then could he speak of the "Son of man being lifted up?" (Marg. Ref. e—g.) They could not reconcile these things, and they desired to be clearly informed "who the Son of man was." They knew that he spake of himself by that title: but did he or did he not mean, that he was the Messiah?—Thus they took a part of Scripture, and drew erroneous conclusions from it, because they overlooked other parts of the same holy records: for had they properly adverted to those prophecies which explicitly foretold the sufferings and death of the Messiah, (Notes, Ps. 22: Is. 53: Dan. 9:24—27. Zech. 13:7.) they must have inferred his resurrection and subsequent glory, from those scriptures which foretold that he should abide and reign for ever. Our Lord, however, did not see good to anticipate that answer to the question, which the event would speedily give them: but he warned them, that the light would continue with them only a little while, and exhorted them to walk in it while they had it, before they were overtaken by the most dangerous and deplorable darkness. He, "the Light of the world," continued with them a very short time, in respect of his personal ministry: the light of divine truth was soon after withdrawn from the unbelieving Jews, and they have ever since wandered "in darkness, not knowing whither they go." (Marg. Ref. h—n. Notes, 3:19—21. Prov. 4:18,19. Is. 8:20—22. Jer. 13:15—17. 1 John 2:7—11. Jude 11—13.) If then the Jews desired to walk in the light, they must believe in it, and follow its instructions and directions: thus they would become "children of the light," the children of "God, who is Light," and conformed to him in knowledge, righteousness, and felicity; and so be "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," and walk in the light in some measure as they do. (Notes, Eph. 5:8—14. Col. 1:9—14. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.)—Having said this, our Lord retired and concealed himself from his persecutors, probably by going privately to Bethany. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 10:32—39, v. 39. Luke 21:37,38.)

V. 37—41. The obstinate unbelief of the Jews, notwithstanding the numerous and stupendous miracles of Jesus, was a most evident accomplishment of an ancient prophecy. (Note, Is. 53:1.) It was predicted by Isaiah, as by one astonished, that few in comparison would believe the report of the Messiah's being come; because his external appearance would not coincide with their carnal expectations: and in the case of these few, "the arm," or power "of the LORD" would be displayed, or made bare, to subdue their pride, enmity, and worldly prejudices, and to bring them to believe in their lowly and spiritual Redeemer. Or, the inquiry might be, to whom the despised Messiah would be made known, as the Arm or Power of God to salvation. (Marg. Ref. p, u.) None of our fallen race, indeed, are inclined of themselves to welcome the salvation of God: but the Jews of that generation did every thing which could be conceived to provoke him to withhold it from them, and to "give them up to their own hearts' lusts." "Therefore they could not believe," for the same prophet had also foretold, that "God would blind their eyes," &c. (Marg. Ref. x—d Notes, Is. 6:9,10. Matt. 13:14,15.) They had long shut their own eyes, and hardened their own hearts; and so God would give up many of them to that judicial blindness, which would render their conversion and salvation impossible. The prophecy was not the motive, or the cause, of their wickedness; but it was the declaration of the purpose of God, which could not be defeated: as therefore this prophecy stood in Scripture against them, and others of like character who hated the truth from love of sin, the event became certain; in which sense it is said, that "they could not believe." (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—Numbers indeed were given up to judicial blindness; yet others in the multitude were not: and the preceding exhortations and warnings would eventually be useful to many of these, as well as manifest the desperate enmity of the others. In fact, a large "remnant according to the election of grace," were afterwards converted, while the bulk of the nation was left to be blinded and hardened. (Notes, Acts 21:17—21. Rom. 11:1—10.)—The unfailing certainty of predicted events, must arise, not only from the infallible foreknowledge of God, but also from his fixed decree; unless it can be thought that he foreknows things over which he has no power, and which he cannot possibly alter! But if thousands and ten thousands more of the Jews, rulers and priests among the number, had embraced the gospel, these prophecies would nevertheless have been accomplished in all the unbelieving part of the nation: as the prediction and promise of God, concerning Abraham's seed inheriting Canaan, were fulfilled; though the generation which came first out of Egypt perished in the wilderness through their unbelief. (Notes, Num. 14:27—30, 34. Ps. 90:13—17.) So that no hinderance to any man's complying with our Lord's exhortations arose from the prophecy or purpose of God; which related only to those who obstinately refused to comply with them.—Could not. (39) Note, Mark 1:45. "'That is,' says Theophylact out of Chrysostom, 'they would not.' ... And yet, if you look to the thing itself, it is true, that the reprobate do not believe, because they will not believe: so that this is the nearest, and most direct cause of their unbelief. ... But the evangelist goes deeper, when he says, "They could not believe:" for as the reprobate will not believe; so it is certain that they cannot be willing, because the darkness in which they are born, cannot comprehend the light.' Beza. (Note, Acts 28:23—29.)—St. John adds, that the prophet "said these things, when he saw his glory and spake of him;" (41) evidently meaning Christ, of whom he discoursed both before and afterwards. The reference is made to that august vision which Isaiah had of "the glory of the LORD," and the worship of the attendant seraphim: and the prophet then saw "the glory of Christ and spake of him;" from which we confidently infer that Jesus is JEHOVAH.—The word, in the first verse of the chapter referred to, is not JEHOVAH, but Adonai; but it is JEHOVAH in the third verse: and the words in the fifth verse, "Thine eyes have seen the King, the LORD of hosts," are very remarkable. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 1:18. Is. 6:1—5.) 'If these words, "These things said Isaiah, when he saw his glory," are not to be understood of Christ, what use have they, or to what purpose do they serve? 44 ¶ Jesus [n]cried, and said, [o]He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me.

45 And [p]he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me.

46 I [q]am come a Light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not [r]abide in darkness.

47 And if any man hear my words, and believe not, [s]I judge him not: [t]for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

48 He that [u]rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: [x]the word that I have spoken, the same shall [y]judge him in the last day.

49 For [z]I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a command ment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

50 And I know that [a]his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

V. 42, 43. The resurrection of Lazarus convinced several even of the members of the Sanhedrim, that Jesus was the Messiah, and they secretly believed in him as such: but most of them regarded him chiefly as a temporal Deliverer. Probably they expected, that he would shortly appear in that character, and then they might safely acknowledge him. At present, the Pharisees, and the leading persons, were so violent in their opposition to him, that these rulers had not courage to confess their sentiments, lest they should be excommunicated: (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, 9:19—23.) for ambition and regard to reputation were predominant in their hearts; and they preferred the esteem and applause of their neighbours, and especially of those in authority, to the favour and approbation of God, which they could not expect while they acted contrary to their consciences. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, 3:1,2. 5:39—44. Matt. 10:32,33,37—39. Rom. 10:5—11, vv. 9,10. 1 John 2:15—17.) Thus they suffered the enemies of Jesus to proceed in their sanguinary measures, till they had him put to death, without making any opposition or protest against them; nay, they even sanctioned their conduct by silent concurrence.—Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, though in a measure culpable, can hardly be thought included in this heavy censure.—The believing spoken of, seems to have been a persuasion that Jesus was the Messiah, without any clear and adequate views of his kingdom, or reliance on him for salvation. (Notes, 2:23—25. 3:16. 5:24—27, v. 24. 8:30—36, vv. 30,31.)

V. 44—50. This seems to have been one of our Lord's last addresses to the Jews before he finally left the temple. (Note, Matt. 23:37—39.) He proclaimed in the most public manner, with a loud voice, saying, "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me," (that is, only or ultimately,) "but on him who sent me." Thus every true believer has all the divine perfections, for the foundation of his hope of preservation and eternal salvation: (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—5,17—21.) He added, "He that seeth me, seeth him that sent me." So that every one, who saw or contemplated him, at the same time contemplated also the Father who sent him. In his holy character the moral perfections of God were displayed; his miracles showed the divine power, authority, and compassion; his knowledge of distant events, and of the secrets of men's hearts, and his most consummate prudence discovered the divine omniscience and wisdom; and his mediatorial undertaking, obedience, sufferings, and intercession, form the grand exhibition of the glorious justice, holiness, truth, and mercy of God. This was so manifest, that not only believers saw and loved the Father in him; but unbelievers also "saw and hated both him and his Father." (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, 14:7—14, v. 9. 15:22—25.)—Others indeed had been enlightened, after they came into the world, and so shone for a while, with feeble and reflected beams; but Jesus was the Light of heaven, and "came a Light into the world," to illuminate it by his doctrine: so that no believer in him would abide in darkness, and every remains of ignorance and error would gradually be dispelled. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 34—36. 1:4—9. 8:12. Is. 42:13—17, v. 16. Mal. 4:2,3. Eph. 5:8—14. 1 John 2:7—11.) Wicked men hated the Light, and would not hear and believe the instructions of Jesus: but for the present, he did not intend to judge or take vengeance upon them, but would bear their indignities and cruelties with perfect meekness; working no miracles but those of mercy, suited to the character of a gracious Saviour, rather than to that of a terrible Judge and Avenger. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Notes, 3:16—21.) Yet those who "rejected him and his words" should not presume on always escaping with impunity. They would be cited before an impartial Judge: and the words of truth and grace, which he then spake and they despised, would certainly rise up in judgment against them, to ensure and aggravate their condemnation "at the last day." For he had always spoken the words which he was commanded of the Father to deliver: and they were not only words of truth, purity, and authority, but of abundant mercy and grace; and he assuredly knew them to contain the only and the effectual way, by which sinners might obtain eternal life. He therefore proclaimed them confidently; and if any rejected them and him, they did it at their peril. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Note, 1 John 3:18—24.)—It is plain, that our Lord designed to mark the distinction, between his first coming as a Saviour, and his second coming as a Judge; though he did not see good to speak in so explicit a manner on the subject, as he had on a former occasion. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. No power or violence of persecutors will deter zealous believers from avowing and expressing their love and gratitude to their gracious Saviour. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 7:36—50.)—When the heart is upright, every endeavour to honour him will be accepted; though men, nay good men, may censure it, as injudicious and unsuitable. But alas! a high profession of religion sometimes covers the most contemptible avarice and dishonesty, or the most consummate wickedness.—Many plead for charity, in opposition to faith, and love to Christ; not because they "care for the poor," but because it best answers their selfish purposes. And in various ways, one part of religion is pleaded for, in preference to other parts: not that the advocates care for what they recommend, or zealously practise it; but because they aim thus to discredit what they especially dislike.—It behooves those especially, who are intrusted with money, to be employed in pious or charitable uses, to watch and pray continually against covetousness. "Carrying the bag" has always been a perilous, though generally a coveted service, especially to churchmen: and alas! thieves have often been employed in it! The less men are disposed to suspect, or call us to account, in matters of this kind, the more scrupulous should we be in our own conduct; for if Satan can prevail with ministers, or professors of the gospel, to venture on petty frauds, by pilfering from the poor, or embezzling holy things; he will soon gain a more decided victory, and expose them to open infamy and complicated ruin.—We should not generally be much moved with the unjust censures which are cast upon us, if we knew the secret practices and motives of those who utter them: it is therefore commonly best, while we are careful to keep a clear conscience, silently to leave the Lord to answer for us when blamed or reproached by others.—Whatever other methods we may occasionally take, of honouring Christ with our substance; the relief of the poor is the stated method, and we have them always with us for that purpose. (Notes, Deut. 15:4—15. P. O.)

V. 9—19. There is nothing so wicked and infatuated but men, who have once decidedly engaged in persecution, and thus staked their credit and authority in that desperate cause, will attempt, in order to escape a defeat, and the infamy and ruin connected with it. The success of the gospel often enrages them to madness; and they speak and act, as if they really hoped to obtain a victory over the almighty God himself! (Note, Matt. 2:3—8. P. O. 1—8.) We should hence learn to avoid every measure which has the most remote tendency to this dreadful evil.—But how miserable must they at length become, who are pained by the honour conferred on Zion's King! All things written of him must be accomplished, "all nations must bow down before him;" "all his enemies must be put under his feet;" and the whole world must either submit to him, or be destroyed by him. Yet the more he is glorified, the more exquisite will be the torture of those who hate him, even to all eternity. Happy then are they, and they only, who from their hearts can cry, "Hosanna: Blessed is the King of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord!" and who can rejoice in the meek and lowly triumphs of his grace on earth, and in the prospect of his universal and everlasting kingdom of glory! (Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 1:7.)

V. 20—26. Those who are nearest to the means of grace, often ripen the most rapidly for vengeance, while sinners come from afar to inquire after Christ: and it is a joyful sound to hear such as have been ignorant and careless, desiring the instructions and prayers of his ministers, that they may become acquainted with him and his salvation. To receive inquirers of this character is his glory and joy; and when they approach him, "he sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied." (Note, Is. 53:11,12.)—So great was his love to us poor perishing rebels, that he would not abide alone in his heavenly felicity; but rather chose to assume our nature, to submit to death in its most dreadful form, and to be laid in the grave; that he might rise and return to his glory, and be attended and followed by an innumerable multitude of those whom he had "redeemed unto God with his blood!" While we admire this unspeakably rich and condescending love of our adorable Redeemer, let us inquire whether our conduct and character, prove us to be the increase of this "Corn of wheat." It is obvious that selfish, ambitious, contentious, revengeful, or sensual professors of Christianity, are not the genuine produce from the meek, humble, gentle, self-abasing, generous, patient, and holy Jesus.—Such are doubtless the tares which the enemy has sown in the field, and which will at last be separated and cast into the fire: while the wheat, who are conformed by divine grace, in good measure, to their Saviour's likeness, shall be preserved to his heavenly kingdom. (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 2 Cor. 3:1—6. P. O.) Let us then examine whether "Christ be in us, the Hope of glory;" and let us beg of him to render us more and more indifferent about this present life and all its trifling concerns; that we may be ready to relinquish, to venture, or to suffer any thing, in order to obtain eternal life; and that we may serve the Lord Jesus with a willing mind, and follow his holy example. For where he is, there will all his true servants be for ever, whatever station they have filled in his church on earth; and they will be honoured by the Father before all his holy angels, and far above the most enlarged of their present expectations.

CHAPTER XIII.

Jesus washes the feet of his disciples; and requires them to imitate his example of humility and love, 1—17. He declares that one of them would betray him; and points out Judas as the traitor to John by a token, 18—26. Satan enters into Judas, who leaves the company, 27—30. Jesus speaks of his glorification, as at hand; and enjoins his disciples to love one another, 31—35. He forewarns Peter, who avowed his readiness to die with him, that before the cock crowed he would thrice deny him, 36—38.

V. 27—33. Even temporary pain and suffering are grievous for us to bear; and the holy Jesus felt a reluctance of nature to the load of anguish which he endured for our sins. We cannot therefore choose suffering for its own sake: reluctance of mind and inward perturbation will be felt on such occasions. The true believer will sometimes scarcely know what he shall say: his nature will plead, "Father, save me from this hour;" (Note, 18:10—14, v. 11.) but grace will enable him to add, "Father, glorify thy name;" and, after the example of his crucified Lord, he will be resigned to suffering, that God may be glorified. This state of mind and heart, notwithstanding all its defects, will be graciously accepted through him who has glorified the Father, and will glorify him, to all eternity.—In the great event of the death of Christ, faith beholds the world judged and condemned; Satan vanquished and deprived of his usurped dominion; his slaves liberated, his works destroyed, and his cause eventually ruined: and while we look to Jesus lifted up upon the cross; we find ourselves impelled by fear to flee from deserved wrath, allured by hope to seek unmerited mercy, and drawn by humble admiration, love, and gratitude, to renounce all other confidences, to break through all impediments, to cast away all our transgressions, and to give up all other interests; that we may enlist under the Redeemer's banner, be employed in his service, and aspire to a participation of his glory. (Notes, 1:29. Heb. 12:2,3.)

V. 34—50. Those who have not faith cannot in a right manner behold the Object of faith, even a crucified Redeemer, "Emmanuel, God with us," "purchasing the church with his own blood;" and must be strangers to its attractive influence, as shown to the soul by the Holy Spirit: they will therefore find a thousand cavils and objections, in excuse for their unbelief. They often insinuate that the Scripture contradicts itself; and then quote the authority of one sacred writer to invalidate the testimony of another: whereas their own partial and prejudiced understanding alone is to blame: for the simplest believer gradually learns to reconcile most of them; as easily as he can the prophecies of Christ lifted up on the cross, and Christ reigning for ever on his glorious throne.—It is, however, generally best to avoid disputing with prejudiced objectors; and rather to remind them how short their time may be, to prepare for death and judgment. It behooves us all to "walk in the light while we have" the light; and an obedient faith is far more suited to our case, than frivolous or disputatious speculations. Those who "believe in the light" will be approved as "the children of the light:" on all others darkness will speedily come, and they will not know whither they are going, till they fall into "the blackness of darkness for ever." For while men indulge their proud and infidel prejudices, rebelling against the light of Scripture, and of their own consciences, and quenching the motions of the Holy Spirit; the Lord Jesus withdraws in anger, leaves them to reject his salvation, "sends them a strong delusion to believe a lie," and so they are finally blinded, hardened, and ruined. (P. O. 2 Thes. 2:5—12.) Such warnings have always been given by those who "saw his glory and spake of him:" and the awful denunciations of the word of God will as surely take effect on unbelievers, as his faithful promises will be fulfilled to his people. Every man therefore should be peculiarly careful not to sin against conviction, from fear of reproach and persecution, from love of praise or reputation, or from regard to the friendship of the world. (Note, Jam. 4:4—6.) That will not be accounted true faith which does not overcome this vain ambition, and teach men to value "the praise of God" more than that of the world; and so induce its possessors to confess Christ before his enraged enemies. Chief rulers are especially in danger of prevaricating in these matters: and thus they may become accomplices in the basest crimes: because the fear of God does not deliver them from the ensnaring fear of men. (Notes, Prov. 29:25,26. Matt. 10:27,28.) But faith in Christ, and through him, in the power, truth, and love of God, "overcometh the world:" (Note, 1 John 5:4,5.) Beholding in Jesus the glory of the Father, we learn to obey, love, and confide in him. By daily looking to him, who "came a Light into the world," we are gradually more and more extricated from the darkness of ignorance, error, sin, and misery; we learn to know the commandment of God our Saviour to be everlasting life; and we enjoy the earnests and foretastes of that blessed inheritance, and at length are admitted to its unalloyed and eternal felicities. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:5,6. 1 John 3:1—3. Rev. 21:22—27.) Yet the same word will seal the condemnation of all who reject and despise it; their present impunity serves only to harden them in in credulity; and the more gracious the truths, promises, and precepts are, which they now despise, the greater will be their confusion, and the severer their punishment, at the last day. 'From all hardness of heart, and contempt of thy word and commandment, good Lord, deliver us.'

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1—5. The transaction first recorded in this chapter, took place "before the feast of the passover;" that is, just at the time when the feast of unleavened bread began, and before the paschal lamb was eaten. Some understand it of a supper prepared for our Lord and his apostles, a day or two before the passover: but "the hour was come in which the Son of man should be glorified;" Judas was, at this supper, marked out as the traitor; Satan entered into him, and he "went out immediately." (26—30.) Before cock-crowing Peter thrice denied his Lord: (38) the subsequent discourse and prayer are continued without the least intimation of an interruption, to the end of the seventeenth chapter; and the eighteenth begins thus: "When Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples;" namely, to the garden, where Judas met him with his armed company. (Note, 18:1—3.) So that the whole narrative must be interrupted, and disjointed in a most violent manner, to admit of that interpretation.—Jesus perfectly knew that his "hour was come:" the last scene of inexpressible sufferings was immediately to begin; after which he should ascend to his Father, and no longer be personally present with his disciples. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Note, 17:1—3.) He had loved them, as his chosen and immediate friends, with the most endeared affection; and they were to continue in this evil world after his departure. His great concern therefore, even in the immediate prospect of his own sufferings and glory, was about their spiritual good: and he spent this last evening of his life, in instructing and comforting them; thus showing his love to them, even "to the end" of his days. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 15:9—11. 16:25—30. 17:11—16.) When supper therefore was prepared, or begun; though the devil had already prompted Judas to betray him, and he had made his infamous bargain with the chief priests; and, though Jesus was fully conscious of his personal dignity, his mediatorial authority, and the speedy approach of his ascension, and glorious exaltation to the right hand of the Father; (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, 3:27—36, v. 35. 5:20—27. Matt. 28:18.) he arose from table, (after a customary antepast had been taken, as it is supposed,) and, assuming the habit and office of the lowest menial servant, he was pleased to perform the laborious and unpleasing service

6 Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and ᵗPeter saith unto him, ᵘLord, lost thou wash my feet?

7 Jesus answered and said unto him, ᵍWhat I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.

8 Peter saith unto him, ʳThou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, ˢIf I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me.

9 Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.

10 Jesus saith to him, ᵘHe that is washed ᵗneedeth not save to wash his feet, ᵛbut is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all.

11 For ʷhe knew who should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean.

[Practical Observations.]

12 So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, ʰKnow ye what I have done to you?

13 Ye ᶜcall me Master and Lord: ᵈand ye say well; for so I am.

14 If ᵉI then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ᶠye also ought to wash one another's feet.

15 For I have ᵍgiven you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you.

16 ʰVerily, verily, I say unto you, ⁱThe servant is not greater than his lord; neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him.

of washing the feet of his own disciples! (Marg. Ref. o.) This aptly represented him, as laying aside his robes of light and majesty, assuming our nature, and appearing "in the form of a servant;" and his self-abasement, obedience, sufferings, and death, that he might wash our consciences from the guilt, and our hearts from the pollution of sin, in his atoning blood, and by his sanctifying Spirit. Or to leave the world, and go to the Father?' Socinian Objection.—'As to his divine nature, he is said to descend from heaven, not by a local descent, or by quitting heaven, but only by the manifestation of himself upon his birth. And in this sense God himself is often said to descend from heaven, when, by any divine work done on earth he demonstrates his presence there? and he is also said to ascend into heaven afterwards. Why therefore may not God the Word be said to descend from heaven, and even dwell with men, (as God is said to dwell in the tabernacle and in the temple,) when the Logos dwelt in the human nature upon earth, and manifested his glory? And also to "leave the world, and go to the Father," not only as properly doing this by the exaltation of his human nature; but by doing all his divine works now from heaven, where he sits in the majesty and glory of the Father?' Whitby. (Note, 3:12,13.)

V. 6—11. It is probable, that Peter was one of the first whose feet Jesus attempted to wash: so that after what had passed in respect of him, none else made any objection; and doubtless Jesus washed the feet of Judas the traitor, as well as those of the rest.—Peter, conscious of his own sinfulness, and firmly believing his Lord to be "the Christ, the Son of the living God;" inquired with the utmost amazement, whether He could really mean to wash the feet of one so mean and sinful: intimating that it would be such a degradation, as he could not bear to think of. (Notes, Matt. 3:11—15. 16:21—23. Luke 5:1—11, v. 8.) To this Jesus replied, that though Peter did not then understand the import, or perceive the propriety, of his conduct; yet it would be explained to him in due time, and he would know and approve of his reasons for so doing. (Marg. Ref. q.) Peter, however, supposing himself actuated by a humble regard to his Master's honour, earnestly protested, that he should never wash his feet; thus setting up his own will and wisdom in opposition to those of Christ! Yet when our Lord declared, that except he washed him, he could have no part in him or his salvation; Peter suddenly changed his mind, and desired him not only "to wash his feet, but also his hands and his head." But our Lord intimated, that this was not requisite: for the man who had been in the bath needed not to repeat his washing, except as his feet had contracted some occasional defilement, as in other respects he was every whit clean; and so were all the apostles, except Judas, who was alluded to as being a hypocrite and a traitor. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 6:66—71. 15:3—5.)—This shows that this action of Christ was an intended emblem of that washing from sin, by his blood and Spirit, without which we can have no benefit from him or part in him. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Ps. 51:1,2,7. Ez. 36:25—27, v. 25. Zech. 13:1. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 2:14. 3:4—7. 1 John 1:5—7. Rev. 1:4—6. 7:13—17, v. 14.) The true believer is thus washed, when he first receives Christ for his salvation: all his sins are completely pardoned; the sanctification of the Spirit pervades all his faculties, dispositions, affections, and conduct; and he is graciously considered as "clean every whit:" yet, by his intercourse with this evil world, he is liable anew to contract guilt and defilement; and in respect of his daily walk, he needs washing continually by Jesus, and learns to apply to him for it, with deep repentance, and by faith and prayer. Thus he is an accepted and sanctified person: but all professed Christians are not thus clean; for some of them are hypocrites, like Judas, and as yet in their sins, in every sense of the word.—'If I do not wash thee, by my blood shed for the expiation of man's sin, and by the sanctifying power of my Spirit, (which I would represent unto thee by this washing,) thou canst have ... no interest in me, no benefit by me. ... Alas! I am all unclean, ... wash me therefore all over: cleanse thou both my hands, that are guilty of many offensive actions, and my head that hath conceived many sinful thoughts. ... Ye are my disciples already; in respect of the main business of regeneration, washed from your sins: yet there are some remains of ... worldly affections, which must still be purged away, in the best of men. And such is your condition at this time. Ye, my disciples, are clean: and yet not all of you.' Bp. Hall.

V. 12—17. When our Lord had "taken his garments" and resumed his place at table, he pointed out to the disciples the immediate instruction which he intended to convey by washing their feet. (7) They allowed him very properly the distinction and pre-eminence of being their Lord and Teacher: if then he, who was in every sense so greatly their superior, had condescended to perform this low and menial service to them, his own disciples; "they ought also to wash one another's feet." There is no ground in Scripture for understanding this injunction literally, nor any trace of its being observed, as a religious ordinance, among the primitive Christians. But the plain meaning is, that the most eminent Christian or minister, by whatever title distinguished, not only if a successor to the apostles, but even an apostle himself, ought readily to perform the lowest, the most laborious, and even the most disgusting act of real charity to the least of his brethren, when there is a proper call to it. 'Not by doing this in a literal sense once a year: but in the spiritual, by being always ready to do any service, by which we may promote the welfare and advance the purity of any member of the church: for "the servant is not above his Lord."' Whitby. No advancement above others in rank, genius or learning, miraculous endowments, or station in the church, can possibly be comparable to the pre-eminence of our Lord and Master above the greatest of his servants: none therefore can refuse such services, without affecting to appear greater than the holy and divine Saviour himself. If the disciples attended to and understood these things, they would be happy in his favour provided they reduced them to practice, and in proportion to the degree in which they copied his example. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Luke 11:27,28. Jam. 1:22—27, vv. 25,27.)—The pride, lordly ambition, ostentation, self-indulgence, indolence, selfishness, and fastidious delicacy, of very many professed Christians, and ministers, and ecclesiastical rulers, form ar-

18 ¶ I speak [a]not [c]of you all; [d]I know whom I have chosen: but, [m]that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me.

19 Now [n]I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass, ye may believe [o]that I am he.

20 Verily, verily, I say unto you, [p]He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me, and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

21 When Jesus had thus said, [q]he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, That [r]one of you shall betray me.

22 Then the disciples [s]looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake.

23 Now there was [t]leaning on Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, [u]whom Jesus loved.

24 Simon Peter therefore [x]beckoned to him, that he should ask, who it should be of whom he spake.

25 He then lying on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord, [y]who is it?

26 Jesus answered, [z]He it is to whom I shall give a [a]sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to [b]Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.

27 And after the sop [b]Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, [c]That thou doest, do quickly.

28 Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him.

29 For some of them thought [d]because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast: or, that he should give something to the poor.

30 He then, having received the sop, [e]went immediately out; [g]and it was night.

[Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said, [h]Now is the Son of man glorified, [i]and God is glorified in him.

32 If God be glorified in him, [k]God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him.

33 [l]Little children, [m]yet a little while I am with you. [n]Ye shall seek me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you.

34 A [o]new commandment I give unto you, [p]That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.

awful contrast to this example and instruction of our Lord. Such men may literally wash the feet of the poor, when there is no occasion for it, nor any charity in it; and they may be proud of it as a parade of "voluntary humility:" but to enter into the spirit of this exhortation, they "must be born again, and become new creatures."—Probably, our Lord spake much more to this effect at the same time. (Marg. Ref. b—i. Notes, 15:17—21. Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27.) It did not suit his purpose to speak plainly then, of the emblematical meaning of this action; but in fact the 'thing signified' forms the grand example for our imitation. (Notes, Phil. 2:5—8. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, vv. 21—24.)

Ye call me Master and Lord. (13) Ὑμεῖς φωνεῖτε με ὁ διδάσκαλος καὶ ὁ κύριος. 14. "Ye call me the Teacher and the Master."—'The article, in the Greek, prefixed to each appellation; and the nominative case employed, where in common language, it would have been the accusative, give great energy to the expression, and show that the words are applied to Jesus, in a sense entirely peculiar. The titles here given can only belong to one.' Campbell.—'Your Master by teaching, and your Lord by commanding; so Grotius. But ὁ Κυριος ... seems to import "the Lord from heaven," (1) or him who is "Lord of all," in which sense, to us Christians, there "is but one Lord." Acts 2:36. 1 Cor. 8:2.' Whitby.—(Notes, Matt. 23:8—10. Acts 10:36—43, v. 36. 1 Cor. 15:45—49.)—An example. (15) Ὑποδειγμα. Heb. 4:11. 8:5. 9:23. Jam. 5:10. 2 Pet. 2:6.—Ὑποδεικνυμι, Matt. 3:7. —Happy. (17) Μακαριοι. 20:29. Matt. 5:3—11. 11:6. 13:16. 24:46. Luke 1:45. 11:27,28. Rom. 4:7,8, et al.

V. 18—30. (Notes, Matt. 26:20—25. Luke 22:21—23.) Our Lord next showed the disciples, that he was aware they were not all upright characters, and would not all be obedient and happy. He perfectly knew what persons he had chosen for apostles, as well as which of them were chosen unto salvation. A traitor had indeed been admitted into their company, that the words which David spake as the type of him, might be accomplished. (Note, Ps. 41:9.) One, who then was eating bread with him, would treat him with the utmost ingratitude and indignity; as if an animal should lift up his heel, to strike the person who was feeding him. Of this he informed them before it came to pass; that they might not be disconcerted by the event, but rather be confirmed by it in their belief, that he was indeed the Messiah of whom all the prophets wrote. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) And they might be sure, notwithstanding this treachery of one among them, that their labours should still be accepted and honoured; and that they, and all faithful ministers, should be considered as the ambassadors and representatives of him, and of the Father who sent him; and also that those who received them as such would be accepted accordingly. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Matt. 10:40—42.) The subject on which our Lord spoke excited inward perturbation, and "he testified" that one of the company "would betray him." In the uncertainty and perplexity which this declaration excited, Peter beckoned to John, to ask Jesus who the traitor was to whom he referred. John was the "beloved disciple," and especial friend of Jesus; and at this time was placed next to him at the table, and reclined on his bosom; though he modestly spake in the third person, without mentioning his own name. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, 19:25—27. 21:1—14, v. 7. 18—23, v. 20. Dan. 9:21 —23, v. 23.)—The token by which he showed that Judas was meant, seems to have been diverse from the "dipping with Jesus in the dish," mentioned by the other evangelists. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Matt. 26:23. Mark 14:20.) Probably Judas understood our Lord's meaning; though he took the sop given him by Jesus without appearing to notice it: and perhaps the desperate resentment, excited by his being thus detected and exposed, gave Satan his advantage to take full and final possession of him, and to hurry him on in his most wicked course to speedy and awful destruction. However this was, Jesus bade him proceed without delay to execute his designs, seeing he was fully determined on them. (Marg. Ref. b, c.)—It may be supposed, that Judas understood this warning: yet the others did not, but thought that Jesus referred to some orders which he had previously given him, to provide those things which were requisite for the proper solemnization of the festival, during the seven days of its continuance; or to give something to the poor out of their small stock, according to his general custom. But nothing could dismay, retard, or win upon the hardened heart of Judas; and he went out speedily, after he had received and eaten the sop: for it was now night; and he supposed it was time to go to the chief priests, that he might be ready to meet Jesus in the garden, to which he concluded that he would in a short time retire. (Marg. Ref. d—g.)—'If Christ had marked out Judas to John and Peter, as the traitor, a night or two before' (the passover,) 'the information must surely have reached the rest of the company by this time.' Doddridge. The other circumstances, by which Judas was more publicly made known, occurred perhaps some before, and some after, this private intimation.—Many learned men state a variety of particulars from the rabbinical writers, concerning the customs of the Jews in celebrating the passover, and seem to think that these illustrate the subject. But the customs which they thus record must have been either mere human traditions, added to the law of God, or warranted expositions of that law. In the former case they are worse than of no value: (Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.) and in the latter the comment must be judged of by comparing it with the text. The fact indeed is, that these customary observances were at best only oral traditions, till long after the passover had ceased to be celebrated, according to the law: that is, till long after the second temple was destroyed. Whatever the Jews may have observed, or do now observe, in this respect; they never could celebrate the passover, according to the appointment of God, since Jerusalem was destroyed: for it was to be kept only at the place which the Lord should choose (Deut. 16:1—6.) And, as immense superstition (as well as uncertainty) is maintained by the rabbinical writers, an very much which makes void, or contradicts, the law itself as written by Moses; this may be considered in general as the reason, why the author is so silent on the subject.—The question, whether Judas partook of the Lord's supper, or not, must be decided by the interpretation given to the second verse. If the supper was ended when Jesus washed the feet of his disciples, Judas must have been present at the institution of the Lord's supper: if the supper was then only prepared, or begun, it is probable that Judas retired, before the Lord's supper was appointed: yet even on this supposition, much might be urged on the other side; and, at last, it is to us of little consequence. This he considered as his glory; seeing it was undertaken from the most honourable motives, would be sustained in so honourable a manner, and would be productive of such blessed and glorious effects: especially as God would be glorified in all his harmonious perfections, by and through him, and his obedience unto the death of the cross. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Eph. 3:9—12, v. 10. 1 Pet. 1:10—12, v. 12.) As this must certainly be the effect, in the salvation of innumerable multitudes of sinners; so God would glorify him, as "the Son of man," in his human nature, by the highest possible exaltation, and the nearest possible union with himself: and this he would do in a very short time. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, 17:4,5.) But with this prospect before him, he looked upon his disciples as his "dear children," yea, as "little children," helpless in themselves, and exposed to manifold dangers and injuries in the world; and as such he compassionated them, and had their welfare near his heart. (Notes, 17:6—12.) He should, however, remain but a very little while longer with them; and it would be in vain for them to seek the comfort of his personal presence: for it would be true in their case, as well as in that of the unbelieving Jews, (though in a different sense,) that they could not follow him to the place whither he was going, but must be left behind for a time. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 36—38, v. 36. 7:31—36. 8:21—26.) Before he left them, therefore, he would give them "a new commandment." The moral law commanded men to "love their neighbour as themselves;" and this implied that reciprocal and special love of believers to each other, of which he spake: but this was now to be explained with new clearness, enforced by new motives and obligations, illustrated by a new example, and obeyed in a new manner. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, 1 John 2:7—11.) Thus it might be called "a new commandment," which he peculiarly inculcated upon his disciples. They were required to love each other for his sake, as bearing his image, and in imitation of his compassionate, disinterested, and generous love to them. This implied a regard to each other's interest and comfort, a sympathy in sorrow and joy, and a delight in one another's company: it required the cultivation of peace and harmony; by reciprocal kindness, candour, forbearance, and forgiveness; by supplying each other's wants, by uniting in prayers and religious exercises, and by concurring to promote the common cause of the gospel, as one body animated by one soul. (Note, Gal. 6:1—5, v. 2.) We ought to love the ungodly with benevolence and compassion, and our enemies with forgiveness and persevering kindness: but believers are to be regarded as the objects of our endeared complacency, our most intimate friendship, and our special and unremitted affection; being brethren in the same family, disciples of the same Lord, soldiers in the same army, travellers in the same journey, heirs of the same inheritance, yea, members of the same body. (Notes, Ps. 16: 2,3. 119:57—63, v. 63. 1 Cor. 12:15—26. 13:4—7. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 2 Pet. 1:5—7. 1 John 3:13—17. 4:7,8.) This love must be regulated by the pattern of the Saviour's love to us; and it must even emulate it in degree; for "we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." "'As I have loved you,' even to the shedding of my blood for you and even for mine enemies, not with respect to any merit on their part, but out of pure affection to their souls. 'This is the love you are to imitate in your affection one to another.' Whitby.—This mutual love was appointed by our Lord, as the peculiar distinguishing mark of his disciples, by which men might every where know them from all other persons; perceiving, that while others were selfish, even in their friendship; believers uniformly persevered in giving up their own interest, ease, credit, or pleasure, to promote the welfare of their brethren, in such a manner, and to such a degree as was never before known. (Notes, 17:20,21. Acts 2:44—47. 4:32—35.)

V. 36—38. Peter paid much more attention to what our Lord said about leaving them, than to the "new commandment" which he had given them. He desired to know whither Jesus was going, being fully determined, as he thought, to follow him. But Jesus informed him, that he could not follow him at that time; (for his work was not done, nor had he then the spirit of a martyr:) yet he graciously assured him that he at length should follow him, though he foresaw how shamefully he was about to deny him. (Marg. Ref. r—u.) And when Peter still insisted upon it, that he was prepared to die with him; he gave him the solemn warning which has already been considered. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Matt. 26:30—35. Mark 14:31. Luke 22:31—34.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Neither the deepest abasement and suffering, nor the highest possible exaltation, rendered our blessed Redeemer, nor can any thing ever render him, for a moment inattentive to the concerns of his disciples, whom he has chosen, redeemed, and called to be his own for ever. The same love, which induced him to ransom and reconcile them when enemies, still influences him to pity their sorrows, to pardon their sins, to supply their wants, to preserve their souls, and to comfort their hearts, now that he has taught them to trust, love, and serve him: and having "loved them hitherto, he will love them to the end," and for ever. But what can be expected too large for him to do or to give, who came down from heaven, and, "in the form of a servant," not only washed his disciples' feet, but shed his precious blood, that he might open a fountain, in which to wash our souls from sin and from uncleanness?—for him, who is continually employed, now that "all things are given into his hands," in thus cleansing the greatest transgressors who come to him for that inestimable benefit, and in drawing others to come to him? We may well be amazed at this "love, which passeth knowledge;" but it would evince the grossest ignorance and the most foolish pride, if we should persist in refusing this spiritual washing, without which we cannot be his disciples, or have any part with him. In respect also of those providential appointments, which he orders in subserviency to our sanctification; we should remember that we often cannot know at the present what he is doing: but as he has promised that "we shall know hereafter," we should confide in his wisdom, truth and love, when we are most in the dark about his intentions, and when all things seem to be the most entirely against us. Much more then should we submit to his authority in respect of those means of grace, which he has required us to use continually, if we would be cleansed from our filthiness. Yet no outward washing can be more than a sign, or means, of the blessing proposed. Our feet, our hands, our heads, or our whole bodies may be washed, again and again, in any way, or by any form: and our hearts and consciences may still remain defiled: but if we are truly washed in the blood of Jesus, and are made partakers of his Spirit, through faith; all things will be made clean to us, and we shall be "clean every whit," according to the gracious dealings of our God with his redeemed people. And, though we cannot but contract defilement in this evil world, our condescending Saviour will daily cleanse us from all sin, till "he present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy." (Notes, 1 John 1:5—10. 2:1,2. Jude 22—25.) Even in this sense, how few are there who are cleansed from their filthiness! In small companies, and among a few communicants or ministers, it may commonly be said, "Ye are clean, but not all," and much self-examination, with prayer to the heart-searching God to examine us, with habitual diligence in every means of grace, and every work and labour of love, are requisite, in order that we may obtain and preserve the assurance that we are partakers of the blessing. (Notes, Heb. 6:9—12. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.)

V. 12—17. If we would have the comfort of our acceptance in Christ, we must inquire whether we understand the nature and tendency of what Jesus has done for sinners; and whether we be aiming to copy his example of condescension and active love: whether we be delivered in good measure from self-importance and self-indulgence; and have learned to stoop, to labour, and to deny ourselves in order to be serviceable to the least of our brethren. (Notes, Matt. 20:24—28 P. O. 24—34. Note, Acts 20:32—35.) But alas! how many are there who refuse to do as Christ has done before them, even where his example is most clearly given for them to imitate! How many of his professed servants act as if they

CHAPTER XIV.

Jesus encourages his disciples to believe in God and in him; and promises them mansions in heaven, 1—3. He shows that he is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, 5. 6: and that he is One with the Father, 7—11. He promises them power to do even greater works than he had done; and that he will grant all the prayers offered in his name, 12—14. He requires obedience as the proof of their love; and promises to give them the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, and much security and comfort, in communion with the Father and with him, as coming and making their abode with those that love him, 15—26. He leaves his peace with them: and shows that his return to his Father was a proper ground for their rejoicing, 27—29: and he informs them of his approaching conflict with the prince of this world, in obedience to the Father, 30, 31.

LET [a]not your heart be troubled: [b]ye believe in God, believe also in me.

2 In [c]my Father's house are many mansions; [d]if it were not so, I would have told you. [e]I go to prepare a place for you.

3 And if I go and prepare a place for you, [f]I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also, were greater than the Lord who sent them! Instead of his lowly deportment, they affect state and consequence; they deem useful employments beneath them: and every troublesome or disagreeable labour of love, such as Jesus delighted in, is intolerable even to their imagination! Nay, among such as seem to be true Christians and sincere ministers, there are but few who fully enter into the spirit of the example which Jesus has left us; and self-love suggests a thousand excuses and reasons, against many useful and important services, which the Saviour would not have listened to for a moment. Yet only those are and will be happy, who "know these things and do them:" for knowledge, without correspondent practice, will only add to a man's eternal condemnation. (Note, Luke 12:47,48.)

V. 18—30. If professed disciples and ministers be found as opposite to Christ, as darkness is to light; if those "who eat bread with him lift up their heel against him," let us not be discouraged: the Scripture has foretold that thus it must be, and its accomplishment may help to confirm our faith and encourage our hope. The Lord "knoweth whom he hath chosen:" the base behaviour of those who disgrace their sacred profession should render faithful ministers the more valued and respected: and indeed the Lord will take care of them and their reputation, and will bless all those who "esteem them highly in love for their works' sake." Yet it should trouble us, as it once did our blessed Lord, to find traitors joining in sacred ordinances, and men high in office in his church, selling him, and betraying his cause for filthy lucre's sake. (Notes, and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. Note, Matt. 21:12,13. P. O. 12—16. P. O. Rev. 18:9—19.) It does not indeed so much concern us to know exactly who they are that answer this description, as to be sure that we are not of the number, and that we really love the Lord as beloved by him. (Note, 1 John 4:19.) But, as some are more near to him than others in union, communion, and endeared affection, we should not envy the privilege of these favoured persons; but avail ourselves of their friendship, to learn more of his mind and will, and to seek increasing nearness and conformity to him.—In process of time, false brethren will be detected; and Satan, having long tampered with them, and put one wickedness after another into their hearts, will at length obtain permission to take full possession; then, perhaps, they will go from the participation of the most solemn ordinances, to perpetrate the most atrocious crimes; and they will separate from the disciples, and make it manifest that they never belonged to them. (Notes, 1 John 2:18,19. Jude 17—19.)

V. 31—38. While hypocrites and apostates "bring upon themselves swift destruction," the loss is wholly their own: for nothing can prevent the glory of the blessed Redeemer, and that of the Father in him. Even on the cross, the Saviour acquired the most illustrious victories over Satan, the world, sin, and death. (Note, Col. 2:13—15.)—There he magnified the divine law, he paid an inestimable ransom, and rescued unnumbered millions of immortal souls from eternal misery, to the glory of God the Father: and therefore a name and a glory have been given to him, above all the inhabitants of heaven and earth; that "all should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father that sent him." (Notes, 5:20—23. Phil. 2:9—11.) The thoughts of his glory, and of his love to us, should reconcile us to our distance and trials, while we continue in this world of sin and trouble. We cannot now follow our ascended Lord to his heavenly felicity; yet if we truly believe, we "shall follow him hereafter," notwithstanding our remaining errors, defilements, temptations, and conflicts: but we must await his time, perform our work, and be gradually humbled, proved, and purified for our inheritance.—Who, that seriously contemplates the state of the Christian church, or the spirit of those who seem most zealous for evangelical truth, would suppose that mutual love, after the example of Jesus, is indeed the appointed criterion, by which all men should know and distinguish his disciples? Had angry zeal for doctrines, forms, and parties, or mutual slanders, revilings, and anathemas rashly denounced, or exactness in the minutiæ of a system, or a perverted ingenuity in multiplying Shibboleths, still more and more to divide and distract the church; had these, I say, been the test of Christianity, modern appearances might suggest less melancholy reflections, than now obtrude themselves upon the serious and pious mind. But alas! the commandment "to love one another, even as Christ hath loved us," is still new and strange to most professed Christians. many seem never to have read it; few appear to understand, remember, or practise it; and "because iniquity abounds, the love of" these few "waxes cold." Instead of exercising candour in judging of our brethren, that we may take in all who appear to hate and repent of sin, to believe in a divine Saviour, and to love and follow after holiness; many seem to think that a rigorous zeal for an orthodox system, or some external forms ought to swallow up all meekness, candour, and kindness, to those who differ from them even in the smallest particulars! (P. O. 1 Cor. 12:12—26. Eph. 4:1—6.) Men in general notice any of the words of Christ rather than these: and self-preference, boasting, and judging others, supplant humble love which "hopeth all things." (Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. P. O. 1—7. Notes, and P. O. Jam. 3:13—18.) But this "haughty spirit goes before a fall;" and some, whom the Lord loves, are left to feel and to show their weakness and folly; in order to humble them, to teach them more tenderness to their brethren, as well as more entire dependence on Christ. May we then "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;" to "love one another with a pure heart fervently," and to "walk humbly with our God."

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1. Our Lord, observing that his disciples were greatly disquieted on account of those things which he had spoken, especially by the prospect of his speedy removal from them, exhorted them not to give place to anxiety or despondency, or to permit trouble to possess and distract their hearts. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 27,28. 12:27—33, v. 27. Ps. 42:4—11. P. O. 43: 77:) They believed in the God of their fathers, and in him, as the Son of God and the promised Messiah: and this faith would be found sufficient to support them, and to secure a happy event to all their trials. (Marg. Ref. b.)—The words may be rendered in various ways.—"Ye believe in God, and ye believe also in me;" therefore be not troubled, for this faith shall preserve you from being overcome.—"Believe ye in God, believe also in me." ... Be not troubled: but how can this be? truly, if ye shall believe in the Father, and in me. ... "Ye do believe in God; believe also in me." ... There is none of you who does not profess to believe in God: if this be indeed so; believe also in me. Thus indeed you will truly believe in God, neither shall ye be cast down by any storms.—Or, "Believe in God; and ye do also believe in me." Believe in God; which if ye do, you by the same endeavour believe in me also.' Beza.—'Let it not suffice you, that ye do believe in one infinite and invisible God, ... who hath made you and all the world: but repose the whole affiance of your hearts upon me, the true and only Son of God, whom ye see clothed with flesh. And the rather now fasten your souls on me, by a steadfast belief; for that ye shall see this humanity of mine subjected to many and great miseries; and much contempt, pain, and insultation, yea, even to an ignominious death: but let not your hearts be troubled with those heavy things which ye shall see to befall me, the issue whereof ye shall find to be glorious.' Bp. Hall.—'There being no example I can find, where the same word, in the same sentence, is used both in the indicative and imperative mood; I had rather render these words in the same mode thus, "Believe in God, believe also in me." That is, That I may prescribe a remedy to that trouble which has seized your hearts from the consideration of my passion, and my departure from you, and of the troubles you must expect in execution of your office; I advise you to believe in God the Author of that doctrine you are to preach, and the Defender of those who propagate it; and in me in whose name you preach it, as having all power in heaven and earth, and being always present with you; and therefore being able to assist and preserve you from all dangers, and to reward your faithful labours, with that crown of glory I have promised.' Whitby.—(Note, 10:26—31.)—'The criticism with which this quotation opens, is probably well grounded. Dr. Campbell concurs in it, and adds, 'How frequently, in the book of Psalms, are the people of God, in the time of affliction, exhorted to trust in the Lord? Such exhortations, therefore, are not understood to imply a total want of faith in those to whom they are given.'—Yet Bp. Hall's view of the nature and object of that faith in Christ, to which the disciples were exhorted, is most satisfactory: He has just before predicted, that all the disciples would forsake him, and that Peter would thrice deny him: (Note

Let not your heart be troubled.] Μη ταρασσεσθω ὑμων ἡ καρδια. 27. 12:27. 13:21.

V. 2, 3. Our Lord next assured the disciples, that in heaven, that holy habitation in which his Father displayed his peculiar presence and glory, many peaceful, enduring, and happy mansions were prepared, for the reception of them, and of all his disciples, however numerous. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Heb. 11:8—10,13—16 13:9—14. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 21: 22:1—7.) Their expectations indeed of a residence with him, and high preferment in an earthly palace, were about to be finally frustrated: and if their hopes of heavenly felicity had been as groundless and delusory, he would assuredly have undeceived them. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, 6:66—71, vv. 68,69.) But he was about to remove from them, on purpose to prepare a place in heaven for them. It had indeed been "prepared" for the children of God, "from the foundation of the world;" and for the apostles, in particular, in his counsel and purpose. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—40. Luke 22:28—30.) Yet the death of the Saviour was necessary to atone for their sins, and to procure them the title to their inheritance: his resurrection would be the earnest of their's: he would enter into heaven as their Forerunner, to open the way, to remove all hinderances, answer all objections to their admission, and make all things ready for their reception. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Heb. 6:16—20. 9:24—28.) He was going from them for this very purpose: he would therefore surely come again; and having prepared them for that holy inheritance, he would at death receive their souls, and at the last day raise their bodies; that so they might be for ever with him their beloved Friend, in that glorious and happy place to which he was going. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 17:24. Acts 7:54—60, v. 59. 2 Cor. 5:5—8. Phil. 1:21—26. 3:20, 21. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)

Mansions. (2) Μονατ. 23. Here only. Α μενω, maneo. Μενουσαν πολιν, Heb. 13:14.

V. 4—6. Our Lord here intimated, that, after all the instructions which he had given the apostles, they must surely know both the place whither he was going, and the way by which they must follow him: and indeed in a measure they did know these things, though they were not able to apply their principles to their present circumstances. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 6:66—71, vv. 68,69.) But Thomas, being weak in faith, greatly attached to the notion of a temporal kingdom, and probably supposing that Jesus meant to retire for a time, before he openly appeared as the Messiah, observed, that as he had not favoured them with any direct information concerning the place to which he was about to go, they could not possibly know by what way they should follow him. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) To this our Lord answered, by saying, "I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life."—He is our "Way" to the Father, and to heaven; in his person as "God manifest in the flesh," and as our Surety and Mediator, by his perfect obedience and his atoning sacrifice, and by his intercession as our Advocate before the throne. He is our great and only High-Priest, who, by his sacrifice on the cross, made propitiation for the sins of the world; and by his resurrection, ascension, and intercession, gives us access with confidence to God, upon a throne of grace. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, 10:6—9. Eph. 2:14—18. Heb. 4:14—16. 7:23—28. 10:19—22.)—He is "the Truth," not only as he is the substance of all typical shadows, and the accomplishment of all the prophecies and promises of a Saviour; but also as the great Prophet of the church, whose doctrine is that truth, by believing which sinners come, through him "the Way," to the Father and to heaven. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, 1:4—9,17. 8:12.)—And he is "the Life" also, by whose life-giving Spirit the dead in sin are quickened, and so enabled to believe in him as "the Truth," and to come by him as "the Way," to the mercy-seat of God. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, 5:24—27. 11:20—27, vv. 25,26. 1 Cor. 15:45—49. Col. 3:1—4. 1 John 1:1,2. Rev. 22:1.) Neither can any man, of any age or nation, approach God as a Father, who is not quickened by Jesus as "the Life," and instructed by him as "the Truth," to come by him as "the Way:" all others will meet God, merely as an offended Sovereign and an avenging Judge. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Matt. 11:27—30. 12:29,30. 1 John 2:20—25.) Having most clearly stated this, our Lord left Thomas to collect from it the place whither he was about to remove.

V. 7—14. Had the apostles duly known their Lord, in respect of his person, character, and mediation, they would proportionably have known the Father also: and indeed they had some knowledge of him, which would from that time continually increase, till they more clearly saw the Father in him, "the Brightness of his glory, and the express character of his substance." (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Matt. 11:27. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3,4.) But Philip, having very confused and defective views of the dignity of his Lord, desired him to discover the Father to them in some sensible manner; according to those visions, with which holy men of old had been favoured: adding that this would suffice for their satisfaction and comfort, when he should be removed from them. To this our Lord replied by inquiring, (as a gentle rebuke,) whether after he had been so long and intimately conversant with them, Philip could possibly be unacquainted with his divine dignity and glory. He had before told them, that "he who had seen him, had seen the Father." (Note, 12:44—50.) what need then had he to request any other vision of the Father, when he had been favoured with so many opportunities of beholding him, by that appointed and sufficient method, in which alone the invisible God can be shown to mortal man? (Marg. Ref. r,—x. Note, 1:18.) Did not Philip yet believe the essential union and mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son, and of the Godhead in his human nature? (Marg. Ref. y. Note, 17:21—23.) He had frequently spoken to them on this subject; and his words were not "of himself," as distinct from the Father; and therefore they ought to have been more regarded: especially as the Father, dwelling in and working by him, had borne witness to him by so many stupendous miracles. (Marg. Ref. z,—c. Note, 10:32—39.) If then the displays of his divine truth, purity, knowledge, wisdom, and goodness, did not induce their belief of this "great mystery of godliness;" they ought at least to believe him, on account of the works which he performed: these manifestly warranted and attested all the doctrines which he taught, as by the seal of God himself; and the authoritative manner in which he performed them, showed that he acted by an inherent power, as the incarnate Son of the Father. This proof, however, would gather still greater force, by the powers which were about to be conferred on them who then believed, and for a time on other believers; (Notes, Mark 16:17—20. Heb. 2:1—4, v. 4.) as they would be enabled in his name to perform similar works to those which they had witnessed: nay, in some respects they would do still "greater works," than what he had wrought in person. This may refer especially to the multiplied miracles of the apostles after the day of Pentecost; to their communicating the gift of tongues and of working miracles to others also; and above all to the immense multitude of converts, which were made by their ministry. This would be the effect of Christ's ascension to the Father, and his intercession for them in heaven: (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, Acts 2:33—36.) for whatsoever "they should ask in his name," as conducive to these important ends, he would bestow it upon them, by his own power and authority; that the Father might be glorified in the honour conferred on the Son, by the success of the gospel through their ministry; by the benign effects of it on men's lives and dispositions; and by the display of his justice, mercy, wisdom, truth, and power, in that way of saving sinners. (Marg. Ref. g—k.)—'Note also here, that Christ saith, Whatsoever ye thus ask, I will do; which, as it supposes in him omniscience, enabling him to know the requests of all Christians upon earth; and omnipotence, enabling him to assist them every where in the performance of the greatest works; so must it consequently imply an unity of essence between the Father and the Son, and so the Father is glorified in the Son. Hence what is here, "I will do it," is, 16:23. "the Father will give you." Note also, that whereas the Jews used to beg a blessing, ... for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; though being only mere men, they never prayed to them; the Christians not only prayed to the Father in the name of the Son, but invoked the Son also, as being one God with the Father: this being a periphrasis of Christians, that they were those who called on the name of Christ. (Acts 9:14,21. Rom. 10:13.) And this seems here to be mentioned to confirm their faith in him; that he who so loved them, had power to do all things for them.' Whitby.—What prophet ever used such language as this of our Lord in these verses? "It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." Gen. 41:16. Dan. 2:30. Acts 3:12.)—The answer of the prayer of faith, in working miracles, seems to have been immediately intended; yet not to the exclusion of any other case, in which believers pray to the Father in the name of Christ, for promised blessings. (Notes, 16:23,24. Matt. 21:21,22.)

It sufficeth us. (8) Αρκει ἡμιν. 6:7. Matt. 25:9. Luke 3:14. 1 Tim. 6:8. Heb. 13:5. 3 John 10.—I am in the Father, and the Father in me. (10) Εγω εν τῳ πατρι, και ὁ πατηρ εν ἐμοι εστι. 11,20. 10:38. 17:21,23.

V. 15—17. Our Lord next reminded the disciples that, instead of yielding to inconsolable sorrow in the prospect of his removal from them, as if that were the most proper expression of their love to him; they ought to show their love by a conscientious and diligent obedience to his commandments: and, while they thus regarded his authority and glory on earth, he, in heaven, would attend to their interests, and, interceding with the Father, obtain for them "another Comforter." The word signifies an Advocate, a Counsellor, a Monitor, and a Comforter. Jesus had been their Advocate, to plead their cause on earth; as he frequently did, against the censures of the scribes and Pharisees; and he was going to be their Advocate with the Father: (Note, 1 John 2:1,2.) He had also counselled, admonished, exhorted, and encouraged them with most animating exhortations and promises: but he was about to be removed from them, and if he should continue on earth, his personal presence must be confined to one place, and was only suited to their state whilst few in number. But another Monitor, Comforter, Counsellor, and Advocate, would be given them, in consequence of his return to the Father, who would abide with them collectively and individually during life, yea, for ever; and with his church to the end of time. (Note, Matt. 28:19,20.) and his gifts and graces would both encourage their hearts, and make them a comfort to each other, and also plead their cause before the world. This character of "another Comforter," or Advocate, and the language here and elsewhere employed, evidently denote personality: and the office itself implies omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence, and all divine perfections. This other Comforter would be sent by the Father, and through the Son who is "One with the Father:" thus the Trinity of Persons is evidently declared in this, and other parallel passages; each Person distinct and divine, yet but one God. (Notes, 25,26 15:26,27 16:7—15.)—This Comforter is called "The Spirit of Truth;" being essential truth, the Revealer of all divine truth, as the Source of inspiration, and who as sent by Christ "the Truth," is the great Teacher of truth in the hearts of believers.—But the world, or unregenerate men of every nation, name, and religious profession, continuing such, cannot receive him, either as a "Spirit of truth," or as "a Comforter;" for all his instructions, influences, and consolations are totally contrary to their dispositions, pursuits, and maxims. (Notes, 4—6. 3:3—6. 12:37—41. 1 Cor. 1:17—19. 2:14—16.) They therefore treat them as foolishness, and reason against them, ridicule them, and blaspheme them, as enthusiasm, delusion, or imposture. But the disciples, being "born of God," were already acquainted with these blessed influences, and the divine Author of them: he even then dwelt with them as "a Spirit of truth," holiness, and consolation; and, as he had already endued them with some miraculous powers, he would shortly be with them in a more abiding and abundant manner. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) This promise of the Comforter is made exclusively to those disciples who loved Christ and "kept his commandments;" (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, 21—24. 15:9—11.) so that it cannot relate to that communication of the Holy Spirit, by which divine life is first given, and the sinner is regenerated. For repentance, faith, love, and obedience, flow from this as their source, or as effects from their cause. It must, therefore, relate to those subsequent influences and consolations of the Spirit, by which "after we have believed, we are sealed;" and which are "the earnest of our inheritance." (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Gal. 4:4—7. Eph. 1:13,14.)—Miraculous powers are no doubt included: but these were not exclusively conferred on those who loved and obeyed Christ: (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) therefore, those animating, comforting influences, which are more immediately connected with love and obedience, must be especially intended.

Comforter. (16) Παρακλητον. 26. 15:26. 16:7. 1 John 2:1—'Verbale à ... παρακεκλησαι verbi παρακαλειν, quod non solum patrocinium alicujus implorare, sed etiam, exhortari, admonere, consolari, solatio referre, docere, et instituere significat.' Schleusner.—By some mistake of his prompters, Mohammed seems to have confounded Παρακλητος, a Comforter, with Περικλυτος, very celebrated.—His name, Mohammed, signifies celebrated; another name which he assumed, Achmed, an adjective from the same root, signifies very celebrated.—He, therefore, affirmed that Jesus foretold his coming, as Achmed, and complains that Christians refused to receive him. Hence the ungrounded notion that he professed to be the Holy Spirit.

V. 18—20. Jesus was about to be removed from the disciples, as a father is taken away by death from his beloved children; but he would by no means leave them as deserted and destitute orphans, without friend or comforter; (Note, 1 Thes. 2:17—20, v. 17.) for he would come to them, that is, by the Holy Spirit dwelling in them. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 15—17,21—24.) The world indeed would soon be deprived of his presence, and would no more see him, so as to contemplate his character and actions, till the day of judgment: but the apostles would see him, not only a few times and for a short space after his resurrection, but continually by faith, and through the influences of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. x. Note, 16:14,15.)—He was about to ascend into Heaven, and as he rose from the dead, and possesses eternal "life in himself"; so they also, and all his true disciples, should certainly live in and by him, till he bring them to be for ever with him. 'As Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; so justified man, being allied to God in Jesus Christ our Lord, doth as necessarily from that time forward always live as Christ, by whom he hath life, liveth always.' Hooker on Justification. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, 4—6. 5:24—29. 11:20—27, vv. 25,26. Rom. 5:7—10. 8:32—34. 2 Cor. 4:8—12. Col. 3:1—4, v. 4.) And in that day, when being ascended into heaven, he should send the Holy Spirit to be their Teacher and Comforter, they would more evidently perceive, and distinctly understand, the in-dwelling of the Father with his incarnate Son; and their own union with him, as their Head of life and influence, in whom they dwelt by faith as their Rest and Refuge, and who dwelt in them by his Spirit, as his temple and peculiar residence. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, 6:52—58. 17:22,23. Eph. 2:19—22. 3:14—19.)

dence of union with him, by partaking of his Spirit of life, and truth, and holiness; it was therefore proper again to remind the disciples, that a disposition to receive, remember, and obey his commandments, was the only decisive proof of their love to him; without which the highest affections must be mere counterfeit or delusion. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 15—17.) They who thus showed their love to him, would be the objects of the Father's peculiar complacency and affection, both as evidencing his choice of them, and as bringing forth the fruits of his grace: (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 15:9—11. 16: 25—30.) and Jesus would reciprocally show all love to them, as his redeemed people and genuine disciples; and in consequence of this love, he would manifest his gracious presence, glory, and excellency to them, in a peculiar and encouraging manner. (Marg. Ref. d.)—When he had given this intimation, Judas, or Jude, (called also Lebbeus, and Thaddeus, the brother of James; not Iscariot, for he had left them before this;) inquired how this could be, that he would manifest himself to them, and yet the world see him no more. He seems to have perceived that there would be great and distinguishing condescension and kindness in his Lord, thus to discover himself to his obedient disciples: but he could not conceive how it could be done; or how it could consist with the setting up of his kingdom: (Marg. Ref. e, f.) To this Jesus replied by assuring him, that those who received and kept his commandments, thus proving that they truly loved him, would be the special objects of his Father's love; and that he and the Father would come, and take up their abode with them. —The Father and the Son being personally distinct, though essentially One, the plural number is here used. The presence and special residence of the Father and the Son, in and with the believer, (as "an habitation of God through the Spirit,") are the source of spiritual illumination, intimate communion, and delightful experience of the love of God to the soul; exciting all holy and heavenly affections, and giving an earnest and foretaste of the joys of heaven. These manifestations are perpetual in some of their effects; especially in the abiding sense of the glorious and gracious presence of God with us at all times, and an habitual judgment that he is worthy of all reverence, love, gratitude, and confidence: but they are more realizing and affecting at one time than another; according as hope, love, gratitude, and admiration, are in more lively exercise, and invisible things are brought near, by the vigorous exercise of faith on the truths and promises of Scripture. But this experience must be peculiar to true disciples: for they who do not love Jesus, neither believe nor obey his words, but cast them away with contempt; and thus they not only offend him, but the Father also, who sent him and spake by him: and therefore they cannot reasonably expect these discoveries of the divine glory and grace to their souls: nor indeed are they capable of receiving or enjoying them. 'Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 15—20. Ps. 25:14. Rom. 8:5—11. 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 6:18—20. 2 Cor. 6:14—18, v. 16. Eph. 2:19—22. Rev. 2:17.)—'"We will come to him," by that Spirit, whose temple is the body of the saints: (1 Cor. 3:16. 6:13.) and by whose in-dwelling they are made an habitation of God. (Eph. 2:22.) Here therefore is no express mention made of the Holy Spirit; because by him it is that the Father and the Son dwell in us. And so it is in the beginning of the epistles, praying for grace and peace from the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ: because this grace and peace were to be conferred on men by the Spirit.' Whitby.—(Notes, Rom. 1:5—7, v. 7. Eph. 1:1,2.)

V. 25, 26. The truths which Jesus had spoken to the disciples in his personal ministry, were fully understood by them: but, when the Holy Spirit, the Author of all holiness, as well as the Teacher of all truth to man, should come to them; he would more efficaciously instruct them, powerfully remove all their prejudices, and assisting all their faculties to receive the truth. (Notes, 15:26,27. 16:7—13.) This indeed, in the case of the apostles, was effected in part by immediate revelation, by which they were infallibly preserved from all error, and guided into all truth. Yet even this revelation was principally made by causing them to recollect the doctrines, promises, and precepts which Jesus had given them; and by enabling them to see the truth, excellency, and glory of them, in the clearest and most convincing manner. Thus our Lord, in his teaching, referred to the Old Testament: and taught nothing but what that ancient revelation, fully understood, had taught men to expect: and the apostles referred to the personal ministry of Christ, and taught nothing but what his words, fully understood, entirely warranted. The same truths, therefore, are taught in every part of Scripture: in some more obscurely, in others more clearly: and any pretended new revelation, that teaches things contrary to the written word, or manifestly not contained in it, is so palpable an imposture, that not only no authority of bishops, popes, and councils can support it, but even miracles themselves would be insufficient to establish its divine authority. (Notes, Deut. 13:1—5. Matt. 16:19. Acts 26:19—23. 2 Thes. 2:8—12. 2 Pet. 3:1—4. 1 John 4:4—6.)—The more ordinary teaching of the Holy Spirit is effected in a similar manner: not by any immediate suggestion or new revelation; but by bringing to our remembrance the words of Christ, and of his apostles and prophets; and by enlightening our understandings, and preparing our hearts to receive them in knowledge and love, and to apply them, according to our cases and circumstances, by obedient faith. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15.)

V. 27, 28. Our Lord being about to die, and leave his disciples, bequeathed to them "his peace" as a legacy; or gave it to them as a donation. This comprised peace with God, peace of conscience, a sweet serenity of mind, arising from confidence in God, and submission to him, with the hope of heaven, and a disposition to mutual love and harmony. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Rom. 14:13—18. Gal 5:22—26. Phil. 4:5—9. Col. 3:12—15.) This peace he gave them, not as the people of the world wish peace and prosperity to one another as a mere compliment, without meaning or sincerity; nor yet in that inefficacious manner, by which many sincerely desire the welfare of those whom they cannot relieve: but in perfect benevolence, and with divine energy; and it was a far richer legacy, than any other dying friend ever bequeathed. (Marg. Ref. s.) They ought therefore by no means to give way to sorrow or alarm, because of the afflictions which awaited them. (Note, 1.) He had told them that he was about to leave them, and to come again to them; (Note, 2,3.) and it they loved him wisely and properly, they would rejoice on that account; as he was about to leave his present abased and suffering condition, and to return to the Father: for, says he, "my Father is greater than I." It has been already seen, that The Word, as God and with God, is declared to be One with and equal to the Father, the Creator and Lord of all. (Notes, 1:1—3. 5:17—29. 10:26—31, v. 30.) In this respect Jesus could not say, "My Father is greater than I:" indeed there can be no greater or less in the infinite perfection of Deity. But, as God the Son was manifested in human nature; and as in this sense he was about to finish his work, and to go to receive his merited recompense, in being exalted to the mediatorial throne; the language is evidently proper, not only as to his human nature, but likewise in respect of his mediatorial character and kingdom, in which he acted as the Servant and Apostle of his Father: even as an ambassador, though equal in nature, is inferior in office, to the prince who commissions him. (Note, 16:7.) In this sense it perfectly accords to all the rest of the Scripture: and it behooves all who love him greatly to rejoice in his exaltation to glory, after his voluntary humiliation. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, 10:32—39. Matt. 28.18.)

29 And [b]now I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, ye might believe.

30 Hereafter [c]I will not talk much with you: for [d]the prince of this world cometh, [e]and hath nothing in me.

31 But [f]that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. [g]Arise, let us go hence.

V. 29—31. Our Lord next showed the apostles, that he had beforehand told them of his death, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, and the descent of the Holy Spirit; in order that the combined evidence of the prediction, and the miracles attending its accomplishment, might confirm their faith. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, 16:1—6, v. 4.) But he should have little more opportunity for conversation with them: for Satan "the prince" of this wicked world was coming to assault him with all his power; both by his servants, even Judas, Caiaphas, and the rulers of the Jews, with Pilate and the Romans, who were about to apprehend, condemn, and crucify him; and by his own horrid temptations. (Notes, 18:19: Gen. 3:14,15. Heb. 2:16—18. 4:14—16. 5:7—10.) As, however, there was neither guilt in his actions, nor sin in his heart and nature, that enemy had no part in him, and could obtain no permanent advantage against him: he would find him in every respect invulnerable, and must therefore experience an absolute defeat in the conflict. (Marg. Ref. c—g.) To himself it would be inexpressibly severe and terrible, but the event would be most glorious. (Note, Matt. 26:36—39.) Indeed, he should not at all have been exposed to pain or death; if he had not voluntarily subjected himself to it, to manifest his ove of the Father, and obedience to him, that he might be glorified in the salvation of his chosen people: 'that the world may know, and knowing imitate my obedience to him in the severest precepts.' Whithy. As this was his purpose, and the time was at hand, he must call upon them to arise, and go thence to the garden, which was the place of preparation and devotion, and also the spot where his enemies were about to apprehend him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. We cannot help feeling trouble and sorrow, under our trials, perils, temptations, and sins; and because of the apostacies and iniquities which we witness: but we should watch against dejection, and that inward prevalence of dismay and disquietude, which excites murmurs and distrust, and unfits us for present duty. (Note, Luke 21:12—19, v. 19.) The vigorous exercise of faith in the promises and perfections of our reconciled God, and in the merits and grace of our heavenly Advocate, forms the proper and the adequate method of keeping trouble from occupying our hearts, and of producing inward joy in the midst of tribulation. For we shall thus be animated by the prospect of a speedy admission into quiet and delightful mansions in our Father's house above, of which an infinite abundance still remain, for the reception of the whole multitude of true believers. This hope will never disappoint us: the promise of the Lord will not deceive us: he has told us, that "in the world we shall have tribulation," and we may know what to expect; and he would not have permitted us to look for so glorious a felicity hereafter, if he had not intended to give it to us. But "he is gone before to prepare a place for us." He is as much performing the part of a faithful and affectionate Friend, now that he is ascended into the heavens, as when on earth he shed his blood for our sins: and he is as mindful of the concerns of all who look for him, as he will be when he shall "appear the second time without sin unto salvation." We ought, therefore, with all diligence and perseverance to use the appointed means of preparing our souls for the holy inheritance of heaven; and to wait, in the patience of hope and the obedience of love, till he shall return to "take us to himself, that where he is, there we may be also." But stubborn unbelievers have no place prepared in heaven, and no friend in the hour of death to receive their departing souls, or to welcome them at the resurrection of the last day: indeed a far different place, "prepared for the devil and his angels," awaits them; and their enemy stands ready to "receive them to himself, that where he is there they may be also;" nor is there any one to prevent the success of his malignant expectations. As therefore all know, that they are liable to be turned out of their present place of residence at an hour's warning; surely, common sense demands it of them, to seek admission into those mansions which Jesus has provided for his redeemed people. —We are indeed far more faulty than Thomas was, if, with all our advantages, we know not whither the Saviour is gone,

CHAPTER XV.

Jesus, by the parable of himself as the true Vine, and his disciples as the branches, shows the necessity of union and communion with him, in order to fruitfulness; illustrates the conduct of God towards his church; and exhorts his disciples to abide in him, 1—8. He shows the greatness of his love to them, 9—15; and that he has chosen them, that they may bring forth fruit which may remain, 16. He commands them to love one another; and warns them to expect hatred and persecution from the world, which hates both him and his father, 17—25. He promises the Comforter, to confirm the testimony which they should bear to him, 26, 27.

I AM the [a]true [b]Vine, and my Father is the [c]Husbandman.

or the way by which we must follow him. Yet ignorance and uncertainty envelope the minds of even professed Christians in general, in this obvious and important matter: and numbers seek to enter heaven by ways of man's devising; while Jesus, "the Way, and the Truth, and the Life," is wholly, or in great measure, neglected; if not despised and opposed. It will, however, be most certainly known at last, that no one of Adam's fallen race ever found acceptance with God, or admission into the mansions of felicity, who refused to seek them by faith in the righteousness, atonement, and mediation of our crucified Emmanuel; by reliance on his word, who is essential Truth, and by seeking life to his soul from him who is the Life itself. It greatly concerns all the opposers and despisers of the grace proposed in the gospel seriously to reconsider this subject; and all who are beginning to seek the favour of God and eternal life, should especially direct their attention to it, that they may not delay to come in that Way by which alone sinners can find access to a holy God, and admission into a holy heaven. (Notes, Is. 28:12—20. Jer. 6:16,17. Matt. 11:27—30. P. O. 25—30.)

V. 7—14. In proportion as we know Jesus, we know the Father also. Every true believer has, in a measure, thus known and seen him: the character, doctrine, and cross of Christ form the glass in which we must contemplate the glory of the invisible God. (Notes, 17:1—3, v. 3. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. P. O. 7—18. Note, 4:5,6.) It is owing to our inattention to his words and works, that our discoveries are so feeble and so few. Thus we are our own enemies; for this is the only satisfactory good which can suffice to fill all our enlarged capacities with an adequate felicity. If we sinners could behold God in his essential glory, the discovery would dismay and overwhelm us: in the Person of Jesus alone can we see Him, as "a just God and a Saviour," as glorious in holiness and abundant in mercy; and as the proper Object of our delightful contemplation, our firm confidence, our humble rejoicing, and our thankful adoration. May the doctrine and character, the miracles and prophecies, the sufferings and glory of our divine Redeemer; the great things which he personally performed when on earth, and the still greater which he has done by his believing servants, since his ascension into heaven; confirm our faith in him, and assure us that "He is in the Father, and the Father in him." Even now, "whatsoever we shall ask in his name," as conducive to our good, and suited to our state, he will give it to us: (Notes, Matt. 7:7—11. Jam. 5:16—18. 1 John 5:14,15.) that in the renewal of our souls to holiness, our steady and successful resistance of temptation, our patient obedience under trials, and the conversion of sinners by our means, "the Father may be glorified in the Son;" for these are very great works in the sight of angels, and of God himself, however men may despise them. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 15:1—10.)

V. 15—24. We have not indeed been favoured with the Redeemer's personal presence; but we are encouraged confidently to hope for that of the Holy Spirit, who is sent by the Father, through his intercession, to "abide with us for ever." His miraculous operations are not to be expected, nor are they needful for us: but as a Teacher, a Sanctifier, and a Comforter, he will always continue with his church; and as the Source of holiness and felicity, he will abide with every believer for ever. (Note, 4:10—15. P. O. 1—15.) "The world" of unconverted men, with all their wisdom and learning, are unable to understand, or to desire and receive, these sacred influences of "the Spirit of truth:" and we can scarcely expect to escape the appellation of enthusiasts or hypocrites, if we profess our faith and hope, and experience in this respect, in the most scriptural manner. But the true believer cannot be unacquainted with that blessed "Comforter, who dwelleth in him;" nor may he deny his obligations to him and dependence on him, from whose gracious influences all his hopes and joys arise; and who will for ever dwell in all those who "love Jesus and keep his commandments." Whatever losses such disciples may sustain, or whatever troubles may await them, they shall not be left destitute and friendless: the absence of their beloved Lord will be short, and his return will be sure; they see him, whom the world perceives not; they believe and are assured, that "he is in the Father, and I they in him, and he in them:" in his strength they labour, in his righteousness they are entitled to eternal life; and "because he lives, they shall live also," and be kept by his power through faith to complete salvation. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—But these privileges do not belong to all who profess, or even are zealous for, the truths of the gospel; being confined to them, whose "faith worketh by love," and whose love to Jesus induces them "to keep his commandments:" and they are enjoyed in proportion to the degree of their love and obedience. Such persons are thus evidenced to be the subjects of the Father's electing love, the peculiar purchase of the incarnate Son, and partakers of the Holy Spirit, in his regenerating and new creating grace. The divine image, renewed upon their souls, is beloved and delighted in by the Father and the Son; their holy affections and obedience are honourable to the gospel: and their happy experience of near and sweet communion with the Lord in his ordinances, the discoveries of his presence and glory to their souls, the light of his countenance, and the joy of his salvation, will make them know, "how he manifests himself to them as he doth not to the world:" while their conscious unworthiness will fill them with thankful admiration and adoration of his unspeakable condescension. But those who do not love Jesus, and who keep not his sayings, cannot know what these special manifestations mean: they only proclaim their own folly, if they deny the reality of them, because they never experienced them: (Notes, Prov. 14:10. 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.) and if any pretend to them, when living in allowed disobedience to Christ, they must be plainly told that they deceive themselves.

V. 25—31 Would we know the way of peace, we must fervently pray for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and simply depend on it: thus the words which Jesus has spoken will be brought to our remembrance, and we shall be enabled to understand, believe, and obey them; and our experience of their truth and goodness will solve those difficulties, which to others are insuperable. Thus we shall receive that legacy which Jesus has bequeathed to all his disciples, even "His peace," which is, "the peace of God that passeth all understanding;" and it will contribute more to our present comfort, than the friendship, the applause, or even the possession of the whole world; for it will garrison our hearts against trouble and terror, in the most afflictive scenes of life, and in the solemn hour of dissolution. (Note, Phil. 4:5—7. We may distinguish the peace which he gives, from that of Pharisees and hypocrites, by its humbling and sanctifying effects; and by its enabling us to unite great tenderness of conscience, with sweet affiance in God's mercy, and calm submission to his will. Let us then rejoice, that our beloved Saviour has, in our nature, entered into "the joy set before him," being "ascended to his Father and our Father, to our God and his God." (Note, 20:11—17, v. 17.) Let us compare his words with our experience and observation, for the daily confirmation of our faith. Let us rejoice in his victories over "the prince of this world:" and though the enemy has still a strong party in our souls, yet, depending on the Redeemer's all-sufficient grace, let us prosecute his victories, both by resisting temptation, and opposing the cause of sin and Satan in the world: let us copy the example of the Saviour's love and obedience; and let us be ready to arise and encounter hardship and danger, with constancy and alacrity; and to go hence by death, whenever he shall please to summon us away.

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1. The close of the preceding chapter intimates, that our Lord and his disciples then arose from table, as about to leave the house and retire to Gethsemane: yet probably they did not set out, till he had finished this discourse, and the prayer with which he closed it. (14:31. 18:1.)—Some, however, think that this and the following chapters were spoken by the way, before they passed the brook Kedron.—Perhaps the fruit of the vine, of which they had been partaking, or the sight of a spreading vine, gave occasion to this illustration of that union between Christ and his disciples, which had before been mentioned. (Note, 14:18—20.)—The nation of Israel, the worshippers of JEHOVAH, had frequently been represented as "a vine;" but Jesus declared that he was "the true Vine." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Ps. 80:8—13. Is. 5:1—7. Jer. 2:20,21.) For that nation had been only a type of the true Israel, the Seed of Abraham; which consists of Christ, and believers as one with him. (Notes, Rom. 4:9—17. 11: Gal. 3:15—29.) He therefore was "the true Vine," the substance of that shadow; and all the fruitful branches of that vine, which had produced good fruit, had been rendered so by grace derived from him.—His "Father was the Husbandman," who planted, watered, guarded, and took care of this Vine, and of all its branches. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Cant. 8:11,12. Matt. 21:33—44.) He had appointed the person of Christ, as "God manifested in the flesh," and from the beginning had made known his purpose of sending him to redeem sinners. He had determined every thing respecting his mediatorial work, and its happy and glorious consequences. He had constituted him the medium of communication, through which alone he would show favour, and convey grace, to any of the apostate race of men. He took peculiar delight in his obedience and sacrifice, as man's Surety; and in "giving him the Spirit without measure," to furnish him for his work; and also that from his fulness all believers might receive grace sufficient to render them fruitful and holy; and he was well pleased with the care of his church, and greatly valued its fruit. (Notes, 1:16. 3:27—36, v. 34.)—The union of the divine and human nature in the person of Christ, and the fulness of the Spirit in him, resemble the root of the vine, deriving the fertilizing juices from a rich soil; and his mediatorial work, like the stem, conveys these to all believers, to render them fruitful.—Like the vine, the Redeemer appears to the ignorant, proud, and unbelieving, mean and despicable; while the wise of this world, the learned, the valiant, and the mighty, are counted like the stately cedar or the sturdy oak: but the fruit of this Vine, and of its branches, is far more valuable than all the other productions of the earth. (Notes, Is. 4:2. 53:2,3. Ez. 15:6—8.)

V. 2. In the visible church there are great numbers, who are united to Christ merely by external profession, by attendance on ordinances, or by filling up some station among his disciples, as Judas did. These resemble those luxuriant branches of the vine, which must be pruned away, or they will crowd the others, and prevent the fruit of them from coming to perfection. Every person of this description, the Husbandman will in due time remove. By temptations and persecutions, many are detected, and become apostates; some are left to turn aside to false doctrines; and others are cut off by awful judgments, or silently removed by death. Thus Judas was removed from among the apostles, and the unbelieving Jews were cast out of the church. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Matt. 3:11,12. 7:21—23. 13:20—22. 22:11—14. 25:1—4. 1 Cor. 11:17—22, v. 19. 1 John 2:18,19.) On the other hand every one who is really united to Christ, by partaking of his Spirit, and by true faith in him, and who shows it, in "the fruits of righteousness" which he produces, is pruned and tended by the Husbandman, that he "may bring forth more fruit." The chastisements, temptations, and humiliating discoveries of their own hearts, by which, (in subserviency to his word and sanctifying Spirit,) he purifies them from their idols and worldly attachments, and mortifies their pride and self-confidence, are often very sharp and painful; but they promote their fruitfulness. (Marg. Ref. e.)

Branch.] Κλημα. 4,5,6. H re only N. T.—Ez. 15:2. 17:6,7,23. 19:11. Sept.—He r eth.] Καθαιρει. Heb. 10:2. Not elsewhere.—Αιρει, "ta th away;" καθαιρει, "purifieth," or cleanseth; and καθαροι, "clean," (3) have a relation to each other in the original, which cannot be preserved in a translation.—None but the unfruitful are taken away.

V. 3—5. The apostles, after Judas had left them, were all branches in some measure fruitful: and Jesus, without excepting any of them, declared that they were clean, through the efficacy of the doctrine which he had taught them, and their believing attention and obedience to it; (Marg. Ref. g. Note, 13:6—11, v. 10.) And, as all their approaching trials were intended for their increasing purity and fruitfulness; he exhorted them "to abide in him," by faith and continual dependence on him: thus he would "abide in them," by the efficacious operation of his grace, rendering them fruitful and comfortable. '"Remain in me," by faith, love, and obedience (10) ... "and I will remain in you" by my Spirit.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Notes, 9—11. 8:30—36. Acts 11:23,24. 1 John 2:26—29.) For, notwithstanding their present attainments, they could no more perform any spiritual and acceptable obedience, without receiving from him further supplies of grace, than "the branch" could bear fruit, except it remained in union with the vine, and derived continual nourishment from it. As he was "the Vine, and they were the branches," this illustration would aptly show them their need of constantly living by faith in him. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21, v. 20.) Every believer, thus abiding in him, would "bring forth much fruit:" but as those who were wholly separated from him could do nothing good in the sight of God at any time; so true believers would not be able to do any thing effectual in the service of God, if the exercise of their faith in him should by any means suffer a temporary suspension. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Notes, Rom. 8:10—13. 1 John 3:18—24, v. 24.)—'As this respects all Christians, the sense runs thus: If ye abide in me, by that faith which purifies the heart, (Acts 15:9.) and works by love; (Gal. 5:6.) and "I in you," by that Spirit, without whom none can be a member of Christ: (Rom. 8:9. 1 John 3:24. 4:13.) you shall abound in the fruits of the Spirit. But without my Spirit abiding in you, and uniting you to me, your Head, you can do nothing acceptable to me, or worthy of my gospel: as it respects the apostles, it may further note, that without the gifts and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit, they could do nothing to convert the world to the faith; as being not sufficient of themselves for that work, but having their sufficiency from that God who giveth them the Holy Spirit. (2 Cor. 3:5,6.)' Whitby.

Abide. (4) Μεινατε. See on 8:31.—Without me. (5) Χωρις εμου. "Severed from me." Marg. 20:7. Matt. 14: 21. Eph. 2:12. A χωριζω, separo.

V. 6—8. (Note, 2.) Unfruitful professors of the gospel would not "abide in" Christ: their profession would therefore wither, and they would only be fit to be cast into the fire of hell: even as the withered branches of a vine are of no use, but men gather them and burn them as waste wood. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Is. 27:7—11. Ez. 15:1—5. 20:45—48. Mal. 4:1. Matt. 3:7—10. Heb. 6:7,8.) But while the apostles and disciples, at that time and in every age, abode in Christ, and maintained communion with him, while his words dwelt in their understandings, memories, and affections, by obedient faith, they might ask what they would, and their prayers would be assuredly granted; and this would secure their increasing fruitfulness and usefulness. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Ps. 37:4. Col. 3:16,17. 1 John 5:14,15. 2 John 1—3,7—11. Jude 20—25.) Thus the Father would be glorified in the abundant fruit produced by them; as the husbandman would value the produce of his vineyard for the sake of his friends, even though he should not want it for himself: their holy doctrine would thus be recommended and propagated; the perfections and wonderful works of God made known; the genuine tendency of the gospel shown; sinners converted; and spiritual worshippers added to the Lord. (Note, 12—16.) At the same time this would prove them to be his true disciples, which could not be known by any other evidence, if this were wanting, and they would become more and more worthy of that honourable title. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, 8:30—36, v. 31. Matt. 5:43—48, v. 45. Gal. 5:16—26. Phil. 1:9—11. Jam. 2:14—26.)

V. 9—11. Our Lord next reminded the disciples of the exceeding riches of his love to them, which resembled that of the Father to him. (Note, 17:22,23.) He indeed is the adequate Object of his Father's love, both on account of his personal dignity and excellency, and his mediatorial righteousness and atonement, and the glory thence redounding to the divine perfections and government: but the love of Christ to his disciples was first placed on them as sinners, and was therefore perfectly unmerited; though he afterwards loved his own image in them, and delighted in their cordial attachment and obedience to him. His love to them was, however, immense, unchangeable, and everlasting; and he intended to honour and bless them, according to the purpose and effect of the Father's love to him. (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.) He therefore exhorted them to "continue in his love;" that is, to persevere in implicit faith and obedience in all things; thus showing the sincerity of their love to him, which would conduce to their habitual experience of his love to them, and all its happy effects. For thus he, their Lord and Saviour, had perfectly obeyed his Father's commandments, and so continued in his love. (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, 14:15—24. Jude 20,21.) He had indeed spoken these words unto them, to excite them to this constancy of faith and obedience, that he might have abundant cause to rejoice in them, and their comfort and usefulness; and that their joy in him, as their unchangeable Friend, might be full and complete, by their uninterrupted communion with him and communications from his fulness, and their assured hope of his glory.—Many interpret the words, "my joy, &c." of the joy which Christ conferred on his disciples; but it is most obvious to explain them of the joy which he had in them; and there is abundant scriptural ground for this interpretation. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Is. 53:11,12. 62:1—5. Zeph. 3:14—17, v. 17. Luke 15:3—7. P. O. 1—10.)—Continue ye. (9) Μειναται. 4,16.

V. 12—16. (Note, 13:31—35.) The great commandment which our Lord, on this affecting occasion, exhorted the disciples to obey, was love of one another, for his sake and after his example. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Eph. 5:1,2. 1 John 2:7—11. 3:16,17.) This would necessarily imply the highest degree of active, liberal, sympathizing, patient, and self-denying affection.—The greatest love which had ever been heard of, was expressed, when a men deliberately laid down his own life, to preserve that of his valued friend or benefactor. Many have rushed upon danger in the field of battle, or on a sudden emergency; and thus lost their lives honourably in defence of those, who were of superior merit or rank, and to whom their obligations were very great: a few instances are recorded of such as were even deliberately willing to part with life, to preserve those whom they greatly loved. But Jesus, "the Lord of glory," was about to lay down his life, in the midst of agony and ignominy, for those who were infinitely inferior to him, utterly undeserving of his esteem, and indeed the meet objects of his indignation and abhorrence. He had fixed his love upon them when they were enemies, and when the sacrifice of his death was necessary to their deliverance from wrath, and reconciliation to God, in consistency with the honour of his law and justice; and he had changed them into his friends by converting grace. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 1 John 4:9—12,19—21.) Thus they had learned to love him, and he had admitted them to the honourable rank of friends: (Note, Jam. 2:21—24.) as such he was now about to die for them, according to his previous engagement; and in doing this, he meant also to show them in what manner, and to what degree, they ought to love one another.—Notwithstanding his dignity and holiness, and their meanness and sinfulness, he purposed to treat them as his intimate friends, so long as they unreservedly obeyed his commandments; without deviating from any of them, through fear of men, or love of the world. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, 9:11. 14:15—24.) They were indeed servants; he had a right to exercise all the authority of a Sovereign, and he had often spoken to them as servants: (Note, 13:12—17.) but from that time he meant still more fully to treat them as his friends. For servants, especially slaves, were seldom informed of their masters' intentions and counsels: but he had made known to them all those things which had been intrusted to him as Mediator, to communicate to his church; and they would soon be instructed, by his Spirit, in a more complete understanding of his whole counsel, and employed to make it known to mankind. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Gen. 18:17—19. Am. 3:4 —8.) But they must recollect, that this marvellous friendship, between "the Lord of glory" and such poor sinful worms, did not originate from them. They were not, of themselves, disposed to choose him and his service; but he had first "chosen them to salvation," called them to be disciples, and selected them to the office of apostles: and their choice of him, and love to him, had arisen from his choice of them. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Rom. 9:15—18. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) He had moreover ordained, or appointed, them his ministers, in order that they might go forth in his name, into the most distant regions; and that by their holy lives, unwearied labours, patient sufferings, faithful preaching, and fervent prayers, some of them, as writers of the sacred Scripture, and most of them as martyrs in his cause, "might bring forth fruit," to the glory of God and the salvation of an immense multitude of souls. (Note, 6—8.) Nor would this fruit perish when they died, or only remain in the gracious recompense bestowed upon them in another life; but it would also abide, in the continuance and success of the gospel, from age to age, even to the end of the world. So that many millions, who would not come into existence till long after their decease, would arise and bless God for the grace bestowed upon them, and for the gospel transmitted to them through their ministry, and by their writings; even as generous wines are preserved a long time, and prove a cordial to those who live, when both the vines whence they were produced, and they who cultivated them, are removed. They were also called into this state of friendship, that, their prayers being answered by the Father through his intercession, all blessings might be conferred on them, and all ability and success secured to them, in respect of their most important work. V. 17—21. The apostles and the other disciples of Christ were engaged in one common cause, for the glory of God and the benefit of mankind; and it would be peculiarly necessary that they should be united in the closest bonds of mutual love: especially, as the world would be sure to hate, oppose, and persecute them. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. 10:16—22. 1 Pet. 4:12—16. 1 John 3:13—15.) To prepare their minds for this trial, they ought to consider that the men of the world had "hated him, before it hated them:" they had treated him with the greatest enmity, contempt, and cruelty, notwithstanding the perfect wisdom, holiness, and beneficence of his whole conduct. If then the apostles had been his disciples in name alone, and their principles and conduct had accorded to the maxims, fashions, and pursuits of worldly men; these would have loved and caressed them, as friends and brethren. (Notes, 7:3—10. 17:13—16. 1 John 4:4—6.) But he had selected them from among their former worldly companions; and effectually called them to preach his humbling doctrine, to copy his holy example, and to promote his cause, in direct opposition to the course of the world: and therefore the same pride, ignorance, and wickedness, which had excited the world to hate him, would induce it to hate them also. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) He had just before reminded them that the servant was not above his Lord: (Note, 13:12—17.) his apostles, ministers, and zealous disciples, therefore, could reasonably expect no other than to be persecuted by such persons as had persecuted him. If men in general had welcomed his doctrine and obeyed it, they might hope that their words also would be thus attended to; but as the contrary was obvious, it would be vain to indulge such an expectation. As they would be faithful in their ministry, and holy in their example, the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, would hate, revile, and persecute them, from enmity to him, and his character, doctrine, and authority; because they knew not that God whom they professed to worship. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, 7:25—30, v. 28. 8:54—59, v. 55. 16:1—3, v. 3. Matt. 10:24—26,34—36. 24:6—8.) For, being ignorant of his perfections, his law, and the spiritual religion which he required and approved, they supposed him to be pleased with their formal services; and expected him to send a Messiah, to humour their prejudices, to sooth them in their presumptuous confidence and to gratify their ambition. So that, when Jesus came in a lowly manner, to call them to repentance, to inculcate his holy religion, and to bestow spiritual blessings; they hated and crucified him; and supposed that they pleased God by cleaving to their ceremonies and traditions, and opposing his gospel.—'This seems a strong intimation, that even in nations which profess Christianity, if true religion fall, as it very possibly may, to a very low ebb; they who exert themselves remarkably for the revival of it, must, on the very principle here laid down, expect hatred and opposition: and that the passages of Scripture relating to persecution are not so peculiar to the first ages, or to Christians living in idolatrous countries, as some have supposed. Would to God, the malignity to be found in some of us against our brethren did not too plainly illustrate this remark. Men will probably experience the truth of it in proportion to the degeneracy of those around them; and to the vigour and resolution with which they bear testimony against prevailing errors and vices.' Doddridge.—'They who preached the same doctrine which rendered him' (Christ) 'so hateful to the world, might reasonably expect the like treatment from it. ... He being not of the world, and they being chosen by him out of the world; the ground of the world's hatred against them must be the same.' Whitby.—"The world," which thus hated and persecuted Christ and his apostles, or that part of it especially intended, were the professed worshippers of God, as much as nominal Christians now are: they were the teachers and rulers of the people of God according to the law; and they were far more zealous for religion, according to their views of it, than the bulk of professed Christians and ministers are at present. Now, if true religion be the same as it then was; if it be preached and exemplified in the same manner, and with the same zeal as in the primitive times; and if the spirit of the world be the same in every age and nation; persecution must be the consequence: except as lukewarmness, and indifference about all religion, paralyze the carnal enmity of the heart; or as wise laws bind the hands of those who would persecute if they might: and even then their tongues and pens will show their deep and slanderous malignity against the truth and its zealous friends. The indiscretions and mistakes of the persons concerned, may give the occasion and advantage to their enemies: but perfect wisdom, meekness, and love would not abate the enmity itself, nay, it would greatly exasperate it.

It hated me before it hated you. (18) Εμε πρωτον ὑμων μεμισηκεν. 1:15,30. Matt. 22:38. Mark 6:21. 1 Tim. 1:15,16.—I have chosen, &c. (19) Εξελεξαμην. See on 16.—To be "chosen out of the world" must imply far more than to be chosen as an apostle: for Judas was neither chosen nor called "out of the world," though chosen to be an apostle.

V. 22—25. (Notes, 3:19—21. 9:39—41. Matt. 11:20—24. Luke 12:47,48.) Doubtless the Jews would in many respects have been chargeable with sin, if Christ had not appeared among them, for even the Gentiles are inexcusable in their ungodliness: (Note, Rom. 1:18—20.) but their sins would have been comparatively small, had he not come among them, published his holy and gracious doctrine, and confirmed it with miracles so varied, multiplied, beneficent, and manifesting omnipotence and sovereign authority, as no other person had ever wrought. (Notes, 5:31—38. 10:32—39.) These things having excited their most virulent enmity, and given occasion to their perpetrating the most atrocious crimes, exceedingly increased their guilt, and left them without the least excuse or palliation of it; for in every respect Jesus so represented to them the divine glory and character, that in hating him they manifested the utmost enmity to God: as all others do who reject and oppose his gospel, when plainly set before them. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, 8:41—47. 14:7—14. Rom. 8:5—9. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. 1 John 2:20—25.) And as the Jews had seen his character and miracles, and observed his ministry, with the most decided enmity; so they had in him seen and hated the holiness, the authority, and the glory of God himself. Thus they fulfilled the words of David, who spake as a type of him, and who was hated without cause by

V. 26, 27. The apostles, when they saw the contempt and cruelty with which their Lord was treated, and when they found that they must expect similar ill usage, might be ready to conclude that none would attend to their instructions. He therefore assured them, that "the Comforter," whom he had promised to send them, would testify of him, by his miraculous operations, and by giving success to the gospel; and they also, instructed, emboldened, and encouraged by his influences, would bear testimony to his person and character, his resurrection and ascension, and the glory of his kingdom and salvation; for which they would be eminently competent, as they had been with him from the beginning of his ministry. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 14:15—17,25,26. 16:7—15. Mark 16: 19,20. Acts 1:4—8,20—22. 2:25—36. 4:5—12,32—35. 5:32. Heb. 2:1—4.)—The Holy Spirit is here said to proceed from the Father; and many suppose this to refer, not only to his being sent forth from the Father and the Son, (as the Son was from the Father,) a willing messenger, to apply the salvation of Christ to the hearts of his chosen people; but to what is called his 'eternal procession' from the Father; by which is meant something in a measure answering to the eternal generation of the Son, yet distinct from it. But these are incomprehensible mysteries; and (though inserted in most of the ancient creeds and formularies) seem not to be explicitly and evidently revealed: perhaps it is therefore better to adore in silence, than to attempt any explanation of such subjects; which, not being clearly revealed, cannot otherwise be at all discovered or understood.

In these texts, however, Παρακλητος may be considered as the antecedent; but even this is not the case, 16:13,14. Indeed Ὁ Παρακλητος is as much personal as ἐκεινος. (Note, 1 John 2:1,2.)—In fact all the language is manifestly personal: "He," "the Comforter," "the Spirit of truth," "is sent," "comes," "bears witness," &c. as in other places he is said to hear, speak, command, forbid, &c.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. In the person and salvation of Emmanuel, the Lord has made effectual provision for the sanctification, as well as the pardon and justification of all those who believe in him: but all others must die unreconciled and unholy. He is "the true Vine," whom God has planted, and waters continually. As professed Christians, we appear to belong to this Vine: but wo be to them, who have no other union, no more intimate communion, than what consists in notions, sacraments, and forms. Such branches do no not "bear good fruit," perhaps indeed very bad fruit; and one after another of them is taken away, and left as fuel to the fire of divine wrath. But even such branches as "bear fruit" have many remaining hinderances to fruitfulness; and the gracious care of the Husbandman consists in "purging them, that they may bring forth more fruit:" so that it may reasonably be expected, that true believers will grow in grace under this heavenly culture; and if sharp means be employed to promote their sanctification, they will, when in their right mind, be thankful for them. They also earnestly desire and fervently pray to be enabled to "abide in Christ that he may abide in them," by his word and Spirit; and they attend on all instituted ordinances, as means of cementing and preserving this blessed union. They know, that only by persevering faith in Christ can they possess the assurance that they "are clean through his word:" they dread nothing so much, as being found at last among the unfruitful branches, and so left to "wither and be cast into the fire;" and this fear, and the ardent desire of being made fruitful and useful ornaments to the gospel, and blessings to mankind, dictate such prayers as will surely be answered.—True Christians long to "bring forth more and more fruit," they know that the will and the power must come from Christ, "without whom they can do nothing:" they find by experience, that any interruption in the exercise of faith and the prayer of faith, abates the vigour of every holy affection; makes way for the renewed energy of sinful inclinations; and thus robs them of all spiritual consolation. On the other hand, when they simply "live by faith in the Son of God," they are made fruitful and joyful; they glorify God, and possess in their own consciences the assurance that they are the true disciples of the Saviour; and are manifested as such in the consciences of others also. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:12—14 5:9—12. 1 John 3:18—24.) Let us then indulge a holy ambition, of living more simply on the fulness of Christ, and of growing more and more "fruitful in every good word and work;" and let us be upon our guard against those who profess to abide in the living Vine, but produce wild and poisonous grapes, instead of "the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God." (Note, Phil. 1:9—11, v. 11.)

V. 9—16. While we admire the unspeakable love of Jesus to us, according to the Father's love of him; let us follow his example of obedience, that we may continue in his love: and, as he "rejoices over us to do us good," so may our joy in him and his salvation be full, by near communion with him, and a conscientious walk before him. (Note, 1 John 1:3,4. 2 John 12,13.)—Let us often recollect what a kind and gracious Lord we serve. It is his "commandment that we love one another, as he hath loved us;" and no love of man, to his dearest friend, ever equalled or even was comparable to his love to us, when strangers and enemies. What admiration must have pervaded the hosts of heaven, when a friendship was proposed, between the Object of their exalted adorations, and poor sinful men on earth! when he assumed human nature, and laid down his life upon the cross for us! when he quickened us by his grace, and so made us willing to become his disciples and his friends! (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.) and when they observe, how he treats us with the most unreserved affection, makes known to us his gracious purposes, and notices our mean concerns! But let us notice, that they alone are the Redeemer's friends, who "do whatsoever he commands them." He has stated this evidence, and insisted on this return of friendship; and it is presumption to claim the privilege, while we allow ourselves in any instance of disobedience.—If we indeed do now choose him as our Beloved, we should remember, that this is the effect of his previous choice of us. He has also appointed each of us his place and work; that we may bring forth fruit, in our holy lives, and the faithful and diligent improvement of our several talents: and as the fruit produced by the apostles still remains for our good, so the effect of our feeble endeavours may in some measure conduce to the benefit of others, long after we are gone to our rest. Even in our case, some to whom God has made us useful, may after our decease be useful to others, and they to others, in increasing numbers, as the produce of a few grains of wheat, sown again and again, from year to year, may at length yield an increase which baffles all calculation. Thus faithful ministers, able writers, and zealous champions for the truth, nay apostolical missionaries may spring from the seed which we have sown: and how far this may extend, or how long it may remain, or what numbers may eventually derive benefit from it, who can tell?—Let us then be "steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord:" (1 Cor. 15:58.) at the same time "continuing in prayer, and watching thereunto with thanksgiving." (Col. 4:2.)

V. 17—27. It is of great importance that all Christians should unite with their brethren in holy love, and in zealous endeavours to promote the cause of the gospel: and let us not be dismayed by the hatred of the world, which can "love only its own;" but must dislike those whom Christ "has chosen out of the world," who bear his image, profess his truth, and obey his commandments. We cannot experience worse usage than our Master before us met with: and we ought not to be offended, or grow weary of well-doing, if we meet with no better. The more we resemble him, the greater enmity will proud and ungodly men feel against us: yet we should be thankful for the restraints which Providence has placed to bloody persecution; and we ought carefully to avoid exciting needless opposition, by rashness, turbulency, or intermeddling with things not properly belonging to us. But, if we suffer for Christ's sake, and from those who "hate him and the Father that sent him," we should "rejoice and be exceedingly glad." (Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Acts 5:41,42. Phil. 1:27—30. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)—Alas! how little do many persons think, that in rejecting and opposing the doctrine of Christ, as our Prophet, Priest, and King, they prove themselves ignorant of that one living and true God, whom they profess to worship; that they are in fact setting up an idol, the creature of their own imagination and proud reasonings, in the place of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" and that their opposition to the scriptural view of the person, atonement, and salvation of the Son of God, springs from determined enmity to the holy character, authority, law, and worship of JEHOVAH. Thus it was with the Jews, "who saw and hated" both the Son of God, and the Father who sent him: thus it is, at this day, with many who have the Scriptures in their hand, the evidences of their divine original clearly set before them, and perhaps the gospel faithfully preached to them; whose guilt is thus exceedingly aggravated, and "they have no cloak for their sin" as they

CHAPTER XVI.

Jesus again warns his disciples to expect persecution, 1—3. He states, that he foretells these things, because he was about to leave them; kindly noticing their sorrow, and assuring them that this would be expedient for them, as he would send the Comforter, 4—7. He explains the nature and effects of the Spirit's influences, 8—15. He intimates his own death, resurrection, and ascension; with assurances, that their sorrow should soon be turned into joy, and that their prayers in his name should be accepted, 16—28. They profess their faith in him: he foretells that they will desert him in his extremity of suffering; yet promises them his peace, amidst their tribulation in the world, 29—33.

THESE things [a]have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended.

2 They [b]shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, [c]the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth God service.

3 And these things will they do unto you, [d]because they have not known the Father, nor me.

4 But these things have I told you, [e]that, when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, [f]because I was with you.

5 But now [g]I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, [h]Whither goest thou?

6 But because I have said these things unto you, [i]sorrow hath filled your heart.

7 Nevertheless [k]I tell you the truth; [l]It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, [m]the Comforter will not come unto you; [n]but if I depart, I will send him unto you.

[Practical Observations.]

8 And when he is come, [o]he will [p]reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment:

9 Of [q]sin, because they believe not on me;

10 Of [r]righteousness, because I go to my Father and ye see me no more; evidently hate Christ, "the Light of the world," because their deeds are evil, and their whole disposition and conduct are diametrically opposite to his holy truths and precepts. But even in these persons the Scripture is fulfilled: while, by the conversion of many sinners, and the holy lives of numbers who profess the gospel, "the Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth," still bears testimony to Christ, and confirms that of those faithful ministers who preach his gratuitous and glorious and holy salvation, after the example and doctrine of those "who were with him from the beginning."

11 Of [s]judgment, because [t]the prince of this world is judged.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. (Notes, 15:17—27.) It is probable, that the apostles had expected honour and distinction among men from their relation to Christ: and if this vain hope had been countenanced, their subsequent trials might have tempted them to conclude that they had been deceived. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, Jer. 20:7—9.) Our Lord therefore warned them that persecutions awaited them, that they might not be stumbled or 'disconcerted, as by an unexpected and intolerable thing.' Beza. The Jewish rulers would not only excommunicate them; but they would soon arrive at such a pitch of bigotry and malice, as to deem the murder of them, or any others of his disciples, an acceptable service to God. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 9:18—23. Matt. 10:16—22. Luke 6:21—23. 21:12—19.) They would not only treat them as "sheep for the slaughter," but as sheep for the altar; and expect to merit the favour of God, by putting them to death, in support of the Mosaic dispensation, and their own traditions; as if this conduct had been 'of the nature of a sacrifice which propitiated for other offences.' Hammond. (Notes, Ps. 44:17—22, v. 22. Rom. 8:35—39.) This was the case with Saul, and many other zealots among the Jews; and the same has doubtless been the case with many professed Christians, who have been "drunken with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus." (Notes, Acts 25:9—11. 26:9—11. Rev. 17:6.)—The rulers of the Jews had a blind, proud, and obstinate conscientiousness, in what they did; but they persecuted the disciples of Christ, from ignorance of the perfections of God himself; and because, not knowing the Father, they knew not his Son, their promised Messiah, when he appeared among them: and thus they expected to please God by such actions as could only gratify the malignant prince of darkness! (Marg. Ref. d. See on Note, 15:17—21, v. 21.)—The highest degree of excommunication was supposed to imply the sentence of death: (Notes, Deut. 13:) and as the magistrate, at this time, had not authority to carry it into execution; the zealots seem to have made a merit of inflicting it, by assassination, in any way which they could devise. (Notes, 9:19—23. Acts 7:54—60, vv. 57—59. 23:12—22.)

V. 4—6. Our Lord had predicted these things thus expressly, before he was taken from the disciples, that the remembrance of his words might support them under their trials. He had indeed several times before given them several intimations, both of the hatred which they would incur, and of his removal from them; but not in so explicit a manner, and as just at hand, as he did at this time: for so long as he continued with them, he was always ready to obviate their misconceptions, and answer their inquiries. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 14:18—20. Matt. 10:16—23. 24:23—25.)—'While I was here, all the malice of men bent itself wholly on me, letting you alone; but now the opposition will light on you.' Hammond. Our Lord now declared, that he was about to return to his Father: for since he had first told the disciples, that they could not follow him immediately, and had intimated that he was about to leave the world; they had not asked him any thing further about the state and place, to which he was going: and therefore, instead of rejoicing in his approaching exaltation, and hoping for important benefits from it, they were overwhelmed with sorrow, as if about to suffer an irreparable loss, (*Marg. V. 7. (Notes, 14:15—17,25,26. 15:26,27.) Our Lord had before intimated, that his departure from the disciples would prove advantageous to them: but he here solemnly assured them, that what he told them was perfect truth, though they seemed so backward to believe him. It was highly conducive to their benefit that he should leave them: for, unless he passed through his sufferings to glory, the promised Comforter would not come unto them; as this blessing was bestowed, through his atonement and intercession; and the abundant pouring out of the Holy Spirit would be the immediate effect of his ascension into heaven, and could not take place without it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 7:37—39. Acts 2:33—36. Eph. 4:7—10.) When therefore he was gone, he would surely send him to them, according to the counsel and covenant of redemption.—Our Lord not only promised that he would "pray the Father" to send the Comforter, but also that he himself, as One with the Father, and as exalted for that purpose to his mediatorial throne, would send him. This certainly does not imply that the Holy Spirit is naturally inferior to the Son of God; neither does the mission of the Son prove that he is naturally inferior to the Father. An ambassador is not naturally inferior to the prince who sends him; and his being a subject is a mere circumstance, not essential to his office: but in that office he appears relatively inferior to his prince, and, as such, acts by commission, and observes his instructions. To this he is bound by the nature of the service, though he might be perfectly voluntary in taking it upon him. This illustration may help our conceptions of the co-equality of the three Persons in the sacred Trinity; and of the relative and voluntary inferiority of the Son and Spirit, as to their respective offices in man's redemption.—The presence of the Comforter would be far more advantageous to the apostles and the other disciples, than even that of Christ in person could have been. He would be every where present with them, when widely separated from each other; whereas the bodily presence of Christ could have been only in one place at once. (11:21—32.) The teaching, counsels, and consolations of the Holy Spirit would be inward and efficacious; and his influences would both qualify them for their work, and ensure their success in it.—'The word Παρακλητος ... signifies an Advocate, and a Comforter. He did the part of an Advocate, in respect of Christ and his gospel, by convincing the world of sin in not believing on him, and of the righteousness of Christ; (9—11) and by confirming the apostles' testimony of him, by signs and miracles, and various gifts imparted to them: (Heb. 2:4. 1 John 5:6—8.) and by pleading their cause before kings and rulers, ... and against all adversaries. (Luke 21:15. Acts 6—10.)—In respect of the apostles and the faithful, he also did the part of a Comforter, as being sent for their consolation and support in all their troubles, filling their hearts with joy and gladness; and giving them an inward testimony of God's love to them, and an assurance of their future happiness. The passage may be interpreted of the miraculous powers communicated by the Holy Spirit, by which the world stood convicted of sin, in rejecting and crucifying the Lord of glory: (9) by which the righteousness of Christ was fully proved, seeing he was returned to the Father, and appeared no more among them: but in proof of his being glorified, he had sent forth his Holy Spirit upon his disciples. (10. Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) Thus it was also evinced, that he would judge the world, as he had declared; seeing that Satan, "the prince of this world," would (by the power of the Holy Spirit attesting the apostles' doctrine) be shown to be judged and condemned as a criminal, and be gradually expelled from his usurped dominion over mankind. (Marg. Ref. Note, 12:27—33, v. 31.) These miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit left unbelievers, both Jews and Gentiles, without excuse; and bound them over to the day of judgment, as determined favourers of Satan's cause in opposition to that of Christ: and doubtless they were the means of conviction to great numbers in different parts of the earth, that Jesus was the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world.—The principal meaning of the words, however, doubtless refers to the general internal operation of the Holy Spirit, on the minds and hearts of men, in every age and country, when he draws and influences them to believe in Jesus Christ for salvation. He deeply convinces them of many things, concerning the evil and desert of sin, and the great sinfulness of numberless thoughts, words, actions, and omissions, of which before they had scarcely thought: especially he convicts and detects the sinfulness of their supposed virtues, and of their hearts; by discovering the glory of God to their souls, showing them their obligations and relations to him, and turning their reflections to the spirituality of the law, to the hateful nature of transgression, as rebellion, ingratitude, and contempt of God, to their own past lives, both as to crimes committed, and duties neglected, to their present behaviour, and to their inward thoughts, desires, and motives, and the imperfection of their best services. (Notes, Ps. 51:4. Rom. 7:9—12.) Thus, the veil of ignorance, pride, and self-flattery being removed, they are brought without reserve to condemn themselves, and to plead guilty before God. He convinces them also concerning the nature of righteousness, and the righteousness of God in the sentence denounced against sinners. (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.) He leads them likewise to realize and anticipate the day of judgment, and to seek deliverance from the condemnation then to be denounced against ungodly men. But especially the Holy Spirit shows sinners the evil of unbelief, and neglect of Christ and his salvation. Perhaps they once thought this meritorious, at least supposed there was no great evil in it: but now they perceive that it arises from pride, love of sin, enmity to God, and the most rebellious state of the heart imaginable: they find, that it implies the greatest contempt of the divine authority, justice, truth, wisdom, and mercy, which can be conceived; that it is a rooted aversion to be reconciled unto God: in short, that unbelief is in some respects the source, and as it were the substance, of all other sins; the most affronting and ruinous of all the crimes, of which men are or can be guilty; and ranks all such as deliberately persist in it, with those implacable enemies of God, who hated and crucified the incarnate Redeemer, when he appeared on earth. (Notes, 3:19—21. Heb. 3:7—13. 10:28—31. 12:22—25, v. 25. 1 John 5:9,10.) In connexion with these discoveries, the Holy Spirit discloses to those he thus enlightens, that "righteousness of God" which is revealed to faith, as the ground of a sinner's justification: even the obedience unto death of the divine Redeemer as our Surety. He convinces them concerning the suitableness and sufficiency of this righteousness for the end proposed; he makes them sensible, that in this way God is righteous in justifying sinners, as well as glorious in mercy, and in all other perfections. (Notes, Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26.) He discovers to them how the law is thus magnified, and how real faith, in the righteousness of Christ," is inseparably accompanied with hatred of sin, with humility, love of God, and the beginning of all holy affections and dispositions. He convinces them, that Christ's ascension to the right hand of the Father, fully proves that his ransom is accepted, and the righteousness finished, through which believers are justified; and therefore there is no need for him to appear again on earth, till he shall come to judge the world. (Notes, Rom. 4:23—25. 8:32—34. Heb. 7:26—28. 9:24—28. 10:5—10. 13:20,21.) The Holy Spirit likewise gives men a realizing apprehension of a future judgment, (which few so believe, as to be influenced in their daily and hourly conduct by the expectation of it,) and convinces them of many things before unthought of, concerning the nature, rule, and consequences of that solemn season. He shows them, that "the prince of this world," who is already judged and condemned, will then be consigned, with all his angels, and all who adhere to him in opposition to Christ, to "everlasting punishment:" but that all who truly believe in Christ, and become his disciples and servants, will then be adjudged righteous through his merits; (their good works being adduced as evidences of their faith;) and so be admitted into the regions of everlasting glory and felicity. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 20:11—15.) Under these realizing convictions, he teaches men to consider their own state, character, and actions; anticipating that decisive season, by daily instituting a judgment upon themselves, whether they belong to Christ, or not; in which they desire to consider all the evidence then to be adduced; that they may be satisfied on scriptural grounds, that their state is good, and that they are prepared to meet their heart-searching Judge, in the endearing character of a gracious Saviour and Friend.—As these things, with what follows, (Note, 14,15.) evidently contain the substance of the distinguishing work of the Holy Spirit, in illuminating, convincing, converting, comforting, and sanctifying believers, of every age and nation, by which he gives success to the gospel in the world; and as it so aptly answers to the words before us; there can be no doubt but that our Lord had mainly respect to it, and not merely, nor principally, to the miraculous influences of the Holy Spirit, in the days of the apostles.—It is, however, further worthy of notice, that an immense proportion of the human race, have, since the pouring out of the Holy Spirit after our Lord's ascension, been led to form such sentiments "concerning sin, righteousness, and a future judgment," as the world in general at that time had not the most remote conception of: so that a far higher standard of morals has been fixed, and a far more general and explicit persuasion of a future season of retribution has prevailed, through numerous and populous nations, even among merely nominal Christians, than were at all thought of in any nation, except Israel, nay, than the bulk of the Jews themselves admitted. But were the convictions of all men "concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment," as deep, abiding, distinct, and efficacious, as those of real believers are; the grand hinderance to their becoming true Christians would be removed. So that these convictions of the Holy Spirit are the very things wanting to men in every part of the world; and all that are wanting, as introductory to his rendering Christ glorious in their eyes, and precious to their hearts: and the success of ministers and missionaries will bear an exact proportion to the measure in which "the Holy Spirit is poured out" on the people, to produce it. This therefore should be the ground of all our hopes, and the subject of our prayers, in every endeavour to win souls. (Notes, Zech. 12:9—14, v. 10. Luke 11:5—13. Acts 2:37—40. 16:29—34.)

V. 12, 13. Our Lord had many things further to communicate to his apostles, concerning his salvation, the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, the abrogation of the Mosaic economy, and the nature of his kingdom and the Christian dispensation. But their minds were not sufficiently freed from prejudices, to receive such instructions, and to make a proper use of them. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Mark 4:33, 34. 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14.) He therefore purposed to leave them to be made known gradually, after his resurrection and ascension, as they became "able to bear them." For "the Spirit of truth" would guide the apostles into every part of the truth, and make known to them many things which he had not explicitly taught them. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Note, 14:25,26.) They were therefore unreservedly to depend on his teaching: for he would punctually adhere to the instructions given him; (even as he, the Son of God, had adhered to the instructions of his Father:) speaking nothing of himself, as if he proposed any separate end or purpose; but teaching exactly those truths which were appointed by the divine wisdom to be revealed to the church; as being One in nature, counsel, and operation with the Father and the Son. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 7. 15:9—11. Acts 1:1—3. 3:19—21. 11:1—18. Rev. 1:1,2.) He would likewise be in them a Spirit of prophecy, to make known to them future events, even to the end of time; that thus the doctrine delivered to them might, in their writings, be handed down to future ages; while the accomplishment of the prophecies, would authenticate the divine original of those writings, to all who should be favoured with them. V. 14, 15. The Holy Spirit, when he came, would make the honour of Christ the great end of all his operations and revelations: he would "glorify him," in respect of his person, doctrine, righteousness, atonement, kingdom, and salvation. He would teach men to honour him, by reliance, subjection, and worship; he would exalt the Saviour in their judgment and affections, and lead them to honour him by their profession, preaching, conversation, and conduct. So that, if any persons should profess to have the Spirit of God, and yet dishonour Christ, by their doctrine, or in their conduct, in respect of his Person, or any of his offices; it might be determined without hesitation, that they were influenced by a lying spirit. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Acts 2:33—36. 1 Cor. 12:1—3. 1 John 2:20—25. 4:1—3. 2 John 7—11.) For the Holy Spirit, accomplishing his great office in the economy of man's salvation, would receive those truths which related to the person, doctrine, and salvation of Christ, and discover them by his inward and effectual teaching to the minds and hearts of all in whom he resided; that they might see the glory and excellency of them, for every sanctifying and saving purpose: and he would direct and influence the apostles and other faithful ministers, to represent them to mankind, with such energetic language and lively affections, as would lead them also to seek them with all earnestness, and their whole heart. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) Indeed all things which belong to the Father, as the Creator and Proprietor of the universe, belongs to the incarnate Son also, as One with the Father. (Note, 17:6—10.) All the perfections and fulness of the Godhead dwell in him bodily, for the benefit of his church, and to effect the purposes of his redemption: the administration of the universal kingdom is vested in him; all judgment is committed to him; and all honour and worship due to him. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, 3:27—36, vv. 34—36. 5:20—30. Matt. 28:18. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Eph 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11. Col. 1:18—20. 2:8,9. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) So that the Holy Spirit, in glorifying him, shows him to the believer, as "the Lord of all," and co-equal with the Father, the Object of all worship, obedience, confidence, love, and praise; and in so doing, the Father also "is glorified in the Son," as One with him: and with reference to this, Jesus said, that the Spirit of truth should take of his, and show it to the disciples, that they might behold, adore, and rejoice. (Notes, 2:6—11, v. 11. 13:31—35.) When this part of the office of the Holy Spirit is added to the convictions before spoken of, (Note, 8—11.) what is wanting to make men established, consistent, joyful, and fruitful Christians? and which of them is not indispensably necessary for this purpose?

Of mine. (14) Εκ του εμου. 15. 7:16. 8:37. Matt. 20:15,23.—Are mine. (15) Εμα εστιν.

V. 16—22. Our Lord next intimated to his apostles, that in a few hours he should be removed from their sight by his death and burial: but after a short time they would see him again, as risen from the dead; because he would visibly ascend to the Father in their presence, that they might testify that event to the world. (Marg. Ref. e—g: Notes, Luke 24:50—53. Acts 1:9—12.)—"Because I go to eternal glory, whence I shall be more efficaciously present than ever before. For then you shall experience who, and how great, I am; which is a more adequate view of Christ, than that which relates to his bodily presence.' Beza.—Some explain the passage, of the short space which would intervene before the disciples should see their Lord in glory, having finished their course on earth: but the context seems to determine the meaning to the first interpretation.—The disciples, however, did not understand his meaning; not being yet aware that he would die, and rise again, and this in so short a time, and then ascend to the Father. But he knew their perplexity; and therefore declared to them, that indeed the most overwhelming sorrows were coming on them; while the world, or the multitude of his enemies, would rejoice and exult, as if they had obtained a final victory over him and his cause when they had nailed him to the cross, and seen him expire upon it. (Marg. Ref. h—m.)—Yet the sorrow of his disciples would soon "be turned into joy:" even as the woman's pangs of travail are, by the sight of her living child, and her satisfaction in beholding it. (Marg. Ref. n—p. Notes, Is. 53:9—12. Luke 16:24—26.) Thus they (as well as he) "would have sorrow:" but he would certainly "see them again" after his resurrection; and then they would have the most cordial, solid, and substantial joy communicated to them; which would not be destroyed by his ascension into heaven, as the Holy Spirit would be their Comforter: nor would the malice of men or evil spirits, or any of their trials and sufferings in life and death, ever deprive them of it. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, 4:10—15, v. 14. Luke 10:38—42. Rom. 8: 35—39.)

V. 23, 24. When Jesus should ascend into heaven, and the Holy Spirit be poured out on the apostles, their views would be so enlarged, and their faith and hope so confirmed, that they would not have occasion to ask him the meaning of any of his words, as before they had been desirous of doing. (19) They would not therefore need his personal presence, which they at the present thought indispensably necessary; for they might be assured that whatever they asked the Father, in his name, would be granted them. (Marg. Ref t, u. Notes, 14:7—14, vv. 13,14. 15:6—8,12—16, v. 16.) Hitherto they had not been used to pray in his name, or through his intercession: that way of access had not explicitly been established; nor had they clearly understood those types, by which it had been shadowed forth under the old dispensation. They had therefore prayed to the God of Abraham, pleading his mercy, promises, and covenant. But "the way into the holiest" would soon be thrown open, by the sacrifice, resurrection, ascension, and intercession of Christ: and then they would learn to plead his righteousness and atonement, as the ground of their hopes; and to come through him, as their great High-Priest and Advocate, to the mercy-seat of God: and in this way, enlarging and multiplying their petitions, their joy and consolation would be abundant and complete. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Rom. 5:1,2. 8:32—34. Eph. 2:14—18. Col. 3:16,17. Heb. 2:16—18. 4:14—16. 7:23—25. 10:19—22. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:4—6. 1 John 2:1, 2.)—To suppose, that Christ meant to forbid them to address him in prayer, when he said, "Ye shall ask me nothing," is a direct censure on the apostles and primitive Christians, when acting under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit (Notes, Acts 7:54—60, vv. 59,60. 2 Cor. 12:7—10, vv. 8,9. 1 Thes. 3:11—13. 2 Thes. 2:16,17.) The disciples had been used to inquire of their Lord, as Man, in all their difficulties: but this would speedily and finally be terminated, and they would be taught to apply to God by prayer, through his mediation. But to address the Father in the name of Christ, or to address the Son, as God dwelling in human nature, and 25 These things have I spoken unto you in [a]proverbs: but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, [z]but I shall show you plainly of the Father.

26 At that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, [a]that I will pray the Father for you;

27 For [b]the Father himself loveth you, [c]because ye have loved me, [d]and have believed that I came out from God.

28 I [e]came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, [f]I leave the world, and go to the Father.

29 ¶ His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no [z]proverb.

30 Now [g]are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee: [h]by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.

31 Jesus answered them, [i]Do ye now believe?

32 Behold, [k]the hour cometh, yea, [i]is now come, [l]that ye shall be scattered, every man [z]to his [z]own, and shall leave me alone: and [m]yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me.

33 These things I have spoken unto you, that [n]in me ye might have peace. [o]In the world ye shall have tribulation: [p]but be of good cheer; [q]I have overcome the world.

V. 25—30. Our Lord had set before the apostles, during his whole ministry as well as in this discourse, the "things pertaining to the kingdom of God," in parables, or "proverbs," in short and weighty sentences, the import of which they did not fully understand: but, after his resurrection, he intended to lay aside all obscurity and reserve; and plainly to instruct them in those things which related to the perfections, truth, and will of the Father, and the way of access to him. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z.) Then they would learn to pray in his name: (Note, 23,24.) but, though they would present their petitions through his intercession, as the way in which the Father would grant them "to the praise of his glory;" yet he did not mean, that there would be any need for him to importune the Father in their behalf, as if he were reluctant to grant their requests, except as thus extorted from him. Seeing the Father also loved them, and delighted to do them good; because, having been drawn and taught by him, they loved and obeyed his only begotten Son, and believed that he came forth from him to be the Saviour of mankind. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 6:41—46,60—65. 14:21—24. 15:9—11.) This was well pleasing in his sight: for indeed Jesus had come forth from the Father, when he assumed human nature; and he was now about to leave the world, and ascend in human nature to the Father, that he might appear in his presence in their behalf.—The apostles, hearing this, declared that he had now spoken plainly, without any proverb: yet, according to the system of some professed Christians, he scarcely ever spoke any thing so abstruse or inexplicable; but it is evident, that those who deny the Deity of Christ do not agree with the apostles in interpreting his words. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 3:12,13. 6:60—65. 13:1—5, v. 3. 17:4,5.)—This declaration of Christ so accorded with the secret thoughts of the apostles' hearts, and answered the inquiries which they desired to make; that it satisfied them of his omniscience; and convinced them, that he was able to answer all their secret doubts; and this served for the present exceedingly to confirm their faith. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 1:47—51. 4:28—30. 20:24—29, vv. 25,27,28. 21:15—17.)

V. 31—33. Our Lord foresaw that, notwithstanding the confident profession which the disciples on this occasion made of faith in him, they would shortly be scattered from him through unbelief; every man seeking some place of concealment, as being afraid or ashamed of being known to belong to him: thus they would shamefully desert him, in his extreme distress, to consult their own safety: (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 18:4—9. Zech. 13:7. Matt. 26:30—35,42—46.) Yet he should not be left alone, without any helper, in the midst of his enraged enemies; for the Father would be with him, to support him, to carry him through all his suffering, and to bring him to the glory reserved for him. (Marg. Ref. m. Note, 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) But, though he foresaw all their misconduct, he had yet spoken this affectionate parting discourse to them, that they might possess inward peace and tranquillity by faith in him; for, in the world they would surely meet with heavy trials and virulent persecutions, not only at this time, but to the end of their lives. (Notes, 1—3. 15:17—21.) The world was indeed an enemy with which they must have many sharp conflicts; while Satan would endeavour, by means of ungodly men, to weary out their patience, or to terrify them into apostacy. But as He, their Surety and the Captain of their salvation, had "overcome the world," and all the temptations with which it had assaulted him; and as he was about to break through all the remaining opposition of "the prince of this world," and his devoted adherents, and to ascend triumphant to his mediatorial throne; so they, through the power of his grace, and by following his example, would at length obtain a similar victory, and be put in possession of the conqueror's crown. (Marg. Ref. n—q. Notes, 12:27—33, v. 32. 14:29—31. Gal. 1:3—5. 6:11—14. 1 John 5:4,5.) They would fight with enemies who had already been vanquished: they might therefore endure the peril and the hardship, with alacrity and constancy, assured of all needful support and comfort; and satisfied, though their faith and patience would be sharply tried, that the event would be unspeakably glorious and happy. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. How fallacious is the common opinion, that God will accept every man who is sincere in his religion, whatever it may be! For the most bigoted and cruel persecutors, with their anathemas, interdicts, excommunications, prisons, inquisitions, fire, and faggots, have often been very sincere, in their way; indeed no less sincere than the more candid and philosophical opposers of "the truth, as it is in Jesus." They have murdered the true worshippers of God, by thousands, tens of thousands, and verily imagined that they were offering him an acceptable sacrifice! (Note, 1 Tim. 1:15,16.) But did these men sincerely desire to know the truth and do the will of God? Did they humbly and impartially examine his word, and pray to be taught by his Spirit, that they might know what he would have them to do? Did they sincerely embrace and profess the truth, and obey the will of God as far as they knew it; without being at all influenced by temporal interests, or by fear of reproach and persecution? Were they sincerely willing to obtain the favour of God, and to devote themselves to his service, at any price, or without regarding consequences?—Without this state of heart and tenor of conduct, what is called sincerity may be a compound of obstinate prejudice, wilful ignorance, proud self-confidence, carnal policy, and malignant passions: and the event will prove, that, after all the pretences of such men, and with all their advantages, they were entire strangers and enemies, both "to the Father and the Son;" and "that they hated the light, because their deeds were evil."—The prophecies of Scripture, however, so prepare the attentive believer's mind for these events, that, instead of being stumbled at them, he sees in them a demonstration of the truth of revelation, and an illustration of its doctrines; especially in respect of the "deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the" human "heart;" the subtlety of Satan, that old liar and murderer of mankind; and the awful justice of God, in giving up his enemies to strong delusions, and leaving them to perish with a "lie in their right hand." (Notes, 8:41—47. Jer. 17:9,10. 2 Thes. 3:8—12. Rev. 12:7—12, v. 9. 13—17.)—But let us remember, that humble docility, implicit belief of the Scripture, and a disposition unreservedly to do the will of God, are essential to "godly sincerity," even that sincerity, which is accepted by him. (2 Cor. 1:12.) This will lead men to come to the Father through his beloved Son; and to "set their affections on things above, where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God:" and thus they will learn to rejoice in his exaltation, and in the hope of being with him to behold and share his glory.—If this be our character and experience, we should remember, that our hearts are often filled with sorrow at those events which are highly expedient and advantageous for us. The feeblest believer can see that this was the case with the apostles: the atonement, the ascension, and intercession of the Redeemer, and the presence of the Comforter were not only more desirable than Christ's personal presence; but they were absolutely necessary to them, and to us all, in

CHAPTER XVII.

Jesus prays the Father to glorify him, that he may glorify the Father, and give eternal life, which is found in knowing the Father and the Son, to his disciples, 1—5; to preserve the apostles in unity of faith and love, after his ascension, 6—12; and from the world and all evil, 13—16; and to sanctify them by the truth, 17—19. He intercedes for them, and all who should believe in him through their word; that they might be united in love, admitted to the most intimate communion with the Father and the Son, and be brought to share his glory in heaven, 20—26.

THESE words spake Jesus, [a]and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, [b]the hour is come; [c]glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee:

2 As [d]thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should [e]give eternal life to [f]as many as thou hast given him.

3 And [g]this is life eternal, that they might know thee [h]the only true God, [i]and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.

order to salvation: yet no removal of a most justly beloved relation, or Christian friend, or faithful minister, can possibly appear to us so much as comparable to that loss which the apostles supposed that they must inevitably sustain, when their beloved Lord should be removed from them.

V. 8—15. Every professed Christian ought to inquire, whether the Holy Spirit has "begun a good work" in his heart. Even when about to come as a Comforter, he generally occasions a temporary and poignant sorrow; he always produces deep humiliation; and these are often attended with terror and distress. For, without abasing convictions of sin, and a clear discovery of our guilt and danger, we never understand the value of Christ's salvation: (Notes, Matt. 5:3—5.) but when we are brought to a just estimate of our own character, general conduct, and best duties; we perceive the preciousness of the Redeemer's obedience, atonement, and intercession. Then we also discover the sinfulness of unbelief, and neglect of the gospel: and if at any time we are tempted to despair of mercy, through a sense of our own great guilt and depravity; we are aware that this despair would be a more fatal and atrocious offence, than all our other transgressions. Thus we learn to value and rely upon Christ, for righteousness and for sanctification; and to prepare to meet him with comfort and rejoicing hope when he shall come to judgment. At that awful season, the "prince of this world," and all who continue his servants, will be cast into the lake of fire; and shut up in the blackness of darkness for ever. Every one, in all nations and ages, who is "delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son," experimentally knows what it is to be thus "convinced of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." This is essential to true religion, and to salvation through him, "who was made sin for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Note, 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21.)—If then this be the peculiar work of the Holy Spirit, as the great Agent in applying the redemption of the Son of God; those who are his servants, and "workers together with him," should use all proper means for producing these needful convictions: they should often and particularly lay open the holy law of God, as "the ministration of condemnation:" (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 3:10—14.) They should show the evil of sin, the way of justification by faith in Christ, the guilt and ruinous consequences of unbelief; and the solemn transactions and awful event of "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." On these subjects, all who would be honoured as instruments in converting sinners, should be frequent, copious, alarming, encouraging, and distinguishing. But in matters more disputable and less essential, they would do well, after the example of Christ, not to press them on their auditories, before they are "able to bear them," or to make a good use of them; and to inculcate them gradually, and as the Spirit of truth removes prejudices and darkness from the mind, and enables it to receive them.—While we attend to the sure word of prophecy, and wait for "the day-dawn and the daystar to arise in our hearts;" (Note, 2 Pet. 1:19.) we should carefully observe that the Holy Spirit comes forth from the Father, to "glorify Christ" among men. We need not then wonder, that so many deny his Deity and his atonement, or treat his prophetical or kingly authority with neglect or contempt: for they imagine, that the work of the Holy Spirit was confined to the primitive ages, and that all dependence upon his influences at present at least borders on enthusiasm. Could they ascertain this position, it would follow, that Jesus could "be glorified" only in the primitive times.—In proportion as men overlook, or do not trust, expect, and pray for, the influences of the Holy Spirit, Christ is always neglected and dishonoured, even by those who call themselves his disciples.—On the other hand, if men profess to be guided and influenced by the Holy Spirit, and yet do not honour Christ; but either treat his word with contempt, or place their dependence elsewhere than on his atoning blood, or disgrace him by their unholy lives; it is plain that they are deceivers, or deceived. Where this sacred Teacher and Comforter resides, he shows the Saviour in all his offices, to be glorious and precious; he leads men to depend on him and glory in him; he constrains them by love, to devote themselves to his service, and to honour him by their lives, and by the improvement of their talents to recommend and promote his cause; he enables them to see, that "all things which the Father hath" are the Son's also; that in "honouring him they honour the Father that sent him;" and that all the power and perfection of Deity are in Christ, for the completion of that design of love for which he suffered on the cross. We should therefore have more admiring views of our glorious Redeemer, and more lively affections towards him, did we more entirely depend on the Holy Spirit, more frequently and earnestly pray to "our heavenly Father, to give us his Holy Spirit," as he has promised, (Luke 11:13.) and were we more careful neither to grieve him by our sins, nor to quench his sacred influences by our negligence. Thus we should learn to rejoice in Christ Jesus amidst all our tribulations. (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.)

V. 16—22. For a little while, believers must be absent from their beloved Saviour; and they may be often called to mourn for sin, and to pass through manifold tribulations; while the world around them rejoices in carnal mirth, and destructive prosperity, or perhaps in the success of atrocious iniquities! (Notes, Ec. 7:2—6. Luke 6:20—26. 2 Cor. 7:9—11.) But their joys and the believer's sorrows are alike transient: they have their fears and forebodings to damp their mirth; he has his hopes and anticipations to alleviate his afflictions: (Note, Prov. 14:10.) and, as a sorrow is coming on them, which none can mitigate or terminate; so the believer is the heir of an unalienable joy. (P. O. Luke 16:19—26. Note, 1 Pet. 1:6—9.) Indeed, many of his sorrows are, as a necessary crisis, inseparably connected with everlasting glory, in which all remembrance of grief will be swallowed up in unutterable joy; while the ungodly man's glimmering "lamp will be put out in total darkness."—It might have excited in us astonishment and distress, if we had seen the apostles weeping over their crucified Lord, and the enemies of God glorying in their success: but where is now the joy of his murderers, or the sorrow of his friends? These have seen him again, and are filled with consolation. Such will be the event of every believer's trials: may we then "choose that good part, which can never be taken from us."

V. 23—33. Blessed be God, we are encouraged to come at all times, especially when depressed with sorrow, to the mercy-seat of our God, in the Redeemer's name; that we may ask and receive, till our affliction be turned into "the fulness of joy!" Thus "darkness will become light before us;" those things which seemed most obscure, will appear plain and satisfactory; we shall have increasing evidence, that the Father himself loves us, as those who, taught and drawn by his preventing grace, love and believe in his incarnate Son. We shall perceive that he knows, and even anticipates, our desires and requests; that he delights to hear and answer our prayers; and that even our manifold infirmities, mistakes, and offences, will not cause him to cease from loving us, and communicating all needful blessings to us. But "while we think we stand, let us take heed lest we fall:" we know not how we should act, if we were brought into temptation; we ought therefore to watch and pray without ceasing, that we may not be left to ourselves. (Notes, Matt. 6:13. 26:40,41.)—We must seek our peace and comfort in Christ; and not in the world, which we must conflict with as an enemy, in whatever form it appears; an enemy which we must overcome, or we shall fatally be overcome by it: and we should expect tribulation as long as we continue here on earth. But, relying upon our victorious Saviour, and looking constantly to him, we may go forward with confidence, assured of being made more than conquerors, through the love and power of our omnipotent, gracious, faithful, and unchangeable Friend.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVII. V. 1—3. 'Jesus Christ, the eternal High Priest, being about to offer himself, by solemn prayers consecrates himself as the Sacrifice, and us along with him, to God the Father. This prayer therefore, has been the foundation of the church of God from the creation of the world, is now, and will be, to the consummation of all things.' Beza.—In the preceding chapter our Lord closed his instructions to his apostles, previous to his crucifixion; (except what passed in the garden:) and in this he addressed his Father, in their presence, by a most interesting and affecting prayer; in which his own approaching and most tremendous sufferings seem almost forgotten! Through the whole, he spake as the incarnate Son of God; he supplicated as Man, and as the Mediator of his people; yet he sometimes expressed himself with divine majesty and authority.—In the attitude of reverent devotion, he addressed God, as his Father in a peculiar sense: (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 11:41—46, v. 41. Matt. 11:25,26.) and, observing that the important, the decisive, the long-expected hour was come, when he should expiate the guilt of his people, by his agonizing sufferings and ignominious death, he prayed, that he, the eternal Father, would "glorify his Son." (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 12:27—33, v. 28. 13:31—35, vv. 31,32. 15:12,13.) The Father glorified Christ, by supporting his human nature through his unknown sufferings, and enabling him to exercise perfect meekness, patience, love, and zeal, under them all; by the appearance of an angel to him in his agony in the garden; by the miracles and prodigies attending his crucifixion; by the conversion of the penitent thief; by the testimonies borne to him by Pilate and the centurion; the fulfilment of ancient types and prophecies in him; the acceptance of his sacrifice; his resurrection and ascension; and his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, "angels, principalities, and powers being made subject to him." And the Son glorified God the Father, in the display of his justice, holiness, truth, and mercy, and in magnifying his law and government, both in his humiliation, and in the glory which followed it. (Notes, 7:37—39, v. 39. Ps. 72:17—19. Is. 9:6,7. 49:5,6. Acts 2:33—36. 3:12—16, v. 13.)—This petition referred to the power or authority, committed to him as Mediator, to determine the final condition of all the human race; and to give eternal life to all those who had been "given to him" in the covenant of redemption; (Notes, 6—12. 6:36—40, v. 37. 10:26—31, vv. 28—30.) for eternal life could not be given to them, unless Christ their Surety both glorified the Father, and was glorified of him. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, 5:20—29.) This eternal life consisted in "the knowledge of the only true God," as distinguished from all creatures and all idols; and "of his Son Jesus Christ, whom he had sent" to be the Saviour of the world. God must be known in his perfections, and in the beauty, excellency, glory, and harmony of them. This knowledge must be received from revelation, by faith, and through spiritual illumination, and increased by experience and communion. It cannot be acquired, except by the knowledge of Christ, in his divine Person and mediatorial character and work. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, Matt. 11:27. 2 Cor 4:5,6.) In every other view of God, he either appears so just as to exclude the exercise of mercy to the guilty, or so merciful as to interfere with the perfection of justice, holiness, and truth. The glory and the harmony of the divine attributes must be seen "in the face of Jesus Christ:" this knowledge is always attended with reverential fear and confidence; and it produces love, gratitude, submission, obedience, spiritual worship, and conformity to him. (Notes, 1 Chr. 28:9. Jer. 24:7. 31:31—34. Eph. 3:14—19, vv. 18,19. Phil. 3:8—11. 2 Pet. 1:1,2. 3:17, 18. 1 John 2:3—6. 5:20,21.) This is the sinner's way to eternal life: it evidences his title to it; it is his meetness for it, and the earnest of it; and when this knowledge shall be perfected, holiness and felicity will be completely enjoyed. V. 4, 5. Our Lord next stated, that he had "glorified the Father on the earth." He had glorified him by his perfect obedience, his holy doctrine, and his numerous miracles; and he was about to glorify him by his expiatory sufferings: so that it might be said, that "he had finished his work" on earth; for he was assured of being carried honourably through that closing awful scene. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 4:31—38, v. 34. 19:28—30. Is. 50:5—9.) He therefore called on the Father, to "glorify him with himself," at his right hand, as invested with all authority, exercising all divine perfections, and receiving all adoration; according to that glory which he had with the Father, before the creation of the world. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 1:1—5,18. 16:25—28. Prov. 8:22—30. 2 Cor. 8:6—9. Phil. 2:5—8. Heb. 2:14,15.) This glory he had veiled for a time under "the form of a servant;" in order that in human nature he might be exalted to it, as the Head and Saviour of his body, the church.—To suppose with the Socinians, as some who were far remote from Socinianism, or from being disposed to derogate from the Saviour's glory, have done, that nothing more is here meant, than God's eternal decree of glorifying the man Christ Jesus, not only enervates the language, but induces palpable obscurity and impropriety into it; and sanctions a method of explaining away the Scriptures, which is of dangerous, nay pernicious tendency: for thus the elect may be spoken of in similar language, as indeed some have ventured to speak of their eternal justification. (Note, Rom. 8:28—31, v. 30.)—'Bring my human nature into a participation of the glory, which I the Λογος had with thee before the beginning of the world.' Theophylact.

V. 6—10. Our Lord, in the greatest part of this prayer or intercession, had the apostles primarily in view, but not exclusively. They were the depositaries of his doctrine; and being present on this affecting occasion, were appointed to communicate what they heard, to all other believers, for their instruction and encouragement. Christ had "manifested the name" (or the perfections, purposes, truths, and will) of the Father, to those who had been given to him from among the people of the world, with whom they had associated, before they were called to be his disciples: 'to those peculiar disciples whom thou wast pleased by thy grace to fit, and so to bring to me, to undertake my discipleship.' Hammond. 'To my disciples, whom thou hast given to me, by causing them to believe in me.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. o. p.—See on 1—3, v. 2.) They had been the Father's in an especial manner, not only the creatures of his power, but the objects of his choice, even before they were converted; nay before they were given to the Son to be redeemed and saved by him. At length they had believed, obeyed, and kept his word; and were assured, that all things which Jesus had done, taught, and claimed, (by the gift or commission of the Father to him,) were indeed according to the will, expressive of the perfections, and conducive to the glory of the Father. They had received the words of their Lord with implicit credence, even as he had delivered them from the Father, and were convinced of his divine mission and authority. (Marg. Ref. q—y. Note, 16:25—30.) He therefore offered this prayer especially for the eleven apostles, but not excluding the seventy disciples, and others who believed in him; and not for the world at large: for unbelievers continuing such, were not, in this special sense, interested in his intercession except as any of them were of that number who had been "given to him" to be saved by him; as all those had been who believed in him. Those for whom he prayed were still the Father's, though given to the Son; by reason of the perfect union of essence, counsel, and operation between them. Indeed, not only the same persons belong equally to the Father and to the Son, but the same things also; so that all things belonging to Christ belong equally to the Father, and all things belonging to the Father belong equally to the Son. Thus the power and perfections of the Father are the Son's likewise; and the honour and worship of the Son are the Father's likewise: and there is no competition between their authority or honour: but the most perfect unity, harmony, and coincidence. (Notes, 5:20—23. Phil. 2:9—11.)—And as the disciples were beloved alike by the Son and by the Father; so the Son, equally with the Father, would be glorified in their salvation, and by their holy lives and labours. V. 11, 12. Jesus was at the very point of leaving the world, as to his personal presence in human nature. (Note, 13:1—5, vv. 1,3.) But while he rejoiced in the thought of "going to the Father," he most affectionately regarded his disciples, who were to continue in the world, in the midst of snares, dangers, and tribulations. He therefore interceded with God, as his "Holy Father," (referring to all his moral excellences, as engaged to accomplish the purposes of the new covenant, especially in the sanctification of believers;) that he would "keep them through his own name," that is, according to his power and perfections, and for the glory of his name; or, in the faith, love, and worship of himself: that they might be most intimately united in judgment, affection, doctrine, worship, and labours; even according to the inexplicable union of the Father and the Son in the unity of the Godhead, or of God and man in the person of Christ. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Note, 20,21.) He had hitherto, by his presence and instructions, preserved them in this respect: none of those who "had been given to him" had departed from him, or run into the ways of destruction; save that Judas, who was emphatically "a child of wrath," "the son of perdition," had been left to perish according to the predictions of the Scripture concerning him. (Marg. Ref. i—n. Notes, Ps. 109:6—20. Acts 1:20—22.)—If we understand "the giving to Christ," in this verse, as before; (6—9.) then Judas is not mentioned as an exception, but by way of opposition, or distinction: as the woman of Sarepta is distinguished from the widows of Israel, and Naaman the Syrian from the lepers in Israel. (Note, Luke 4:23—32.) In the preceding verses, those who were given to Christ are stated to have "kept his word," and "believed in him:" but Judas had always been a hypocrite, and was now become a traitor and an apostate; and therefore Christ could not mean to include him in that number. (Note, 6:66—71, vv. 70,71. 13:18—30, vv. 18,21,27—30.) And if in this verse we understand by those "given to Christ," such, as were given to him to be his apostles, without any reference to faith, or to "the election of grace;" we cannot explain the preceding verses in that sense, because they are verified in none but true believers, of which number Judas never had been.—The son of perdition. (12) Note, 2 Thes. 2:3,4. '"The Son of perdition" signifies one who deservedly perishes: as "a son of death," (2 Sam. 12:5.) "children of hell," (Matt. 23:15.) and "children of wrath," (Eph. 2:3.) signify persons justly obnoxious to death, hell, and wrath.' Doddridge.

V. 13—16. Before Jesus ascended to his glory he spake these things, in his exhortation and intercession, before the apostles, that they and their brethren (and indeed all who should duly regard this record of them) might "have his joy fulfilled in them;" that is, the joy which he conferred on them, similar to that which he possessed in the assurance of his Father's love, and in the prospect of his glory.—[t] That the joy they had hitherto from my love to them, (15:11.) my presence with them, and care of them, may, in my absence, be increased by the presence of that Spirit with them, who will supply my bodily absence, (16:7.) and whose fruits are joy and peace, (Gal. 5:22.) yea, by whom I, though absent in body, am still present with them. (14:8.)' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 14:21—24. 15:9—11. Matt. 25:19—23. Heb. 12:2,3.) They would greatly need this support; as he had "given the word" of the Father to them, that they might boldly profess and zealously preach it before men. The world had already begun to hate them on that account; and would still more hate and persecute them, because they no longer were of the same character or party with them, but opposite in every thing; according as he had not been of the world, but contrary to it in his whole doctrine and conduct. (Marg. Ref. q—s, x. Notes, 7:3—10. 15:17—21. Matt. 5:10—12. 10:21—26. 1 John 4:4—6.) He did not pray, however, that the apostles and disciples should be removed out of the world, in order that they might escape the effects of the rage, contempt, and enmity of ungodly men: as they had a great work to do, for the glory of God and the benefit of mankind, which they must continue on earth to finish; at the same time they must ripen for their exalted state in heaven, by passing through manifold trials and tribulations. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Phil. 1:19—26. 2 Tim. 2:8—13. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) But he interceded in their behalf, that the Father would preserve them from the evil; that is, from being corrupted by the contagious influence of the world, or tempted by its smiles or frowns to apostatize from him, through the fatal effects of the remains of sin in their hearts, and by the power and subtlety of Satan, that "evil one:" (Notes, Gen. 48:16. Matt. 6:13. 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) that so they might pass safely and honourably through the world, as through an enemy's country, in some good measure as he had done.

V. 17—19. The apostles at this time were truly converted, called out of the ungodly world, and engaged in a work diametrically opposite to all its sentiments, inclinations, and pursuits: (Notes, 13:6—11. 15:3—5.) but they needed to be far more completely purified, renewed, and consecrated to God, for their distinguished and most important office. Our Lord therefore prayed that they might be "sanctified through the truth" or revealed word of God, every part of which is holy in its nature and tendency; the means of "sanctification by the Spirit," and thus of rendering the man of God completely "furnished for every good work." (Notes, 2 Tim. 3:14—17.)—The commandments, doctrines, promises, warnings, and examples of Scripture, are suited to discover the evil of sin, and to detect it in all its forms and actings; to impress the mind with fervent affections towards God and holiness; to furnish directions, motives, and encouragements for every thing which is good and excellent; and thus to transform the believer's soul into its own holy nature, and to induce him to that dedication of all his powers to God, in the performance of his proper work, which is here especially intended. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) For our Lord immediately referred to his sending forth of his apostles, to publish his gospel in the world: and to their being wholly consecrated and set apart to that service, and prepared to persevere in it amidst all hardships, perils, and sufferings, unto death itself. In this manner, he had been sent by the Father into the world, and had willingly set apart himself, and his whole human nature, as consecrated by the Holy Spirit, to his most arduous work, and was now about to give himself an atoning sacrifice for sin, for the sake of his apostles and disciples, and for the glory of God in their salvation. (Marg Ref. a—d. Notes, 10:32—39. Jer. 1:5. Heb. 5:7—10. 10:28—31.)—In consequence of this, they also would be "sanctified by the truth," and consecrated to the work of their ministry; that they might promote the same cause in the world, by their labours, writings, example, and patient sufferings; and many of them by becoming martyrs for their testimony to his gospel. V. 20, 21. In these verses Christ interceded for all Christians in every age, to the end of the world; and in this view of them, they are replete with instruction and consolation to us. Doubtless the effectual calling of sinners, to faith in Christ, takes place in answer to his continual intercession in heaven, of which this prayer is a specimen and example: but none are warranted to take encouragement from that 22 And [o]the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; [p]that they may be one, even as we are one:

23 [m]I in them, and thou in me, that they may be [n]made perfect in one; and [o]that the world may know that thou hast sent me, [p]and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

24 Father, [q]I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; [r]that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: [s]for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

25 O [t]righteous Father, [u]the world hath not known thee: [x]but I have known thee, and [y]these have known that thou hast sent me.

26 And [z]I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it; [a]that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, [b]and I in them.

consideration, till they in some measure believe his word: he therefore prayed for those "whom the Father had given him," as those "who should believe on him through the word" of his apostles. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 6:36—40. 10:14—18. Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.)—The gospel was especially committed to the apostles, and from them it has been transmitted, through succeeding generations, to us; and will be to posterity to the end of the world.—'The true and saving faith comes from hearing the doctrine of the apostles: and that is the doctrine of the apostles, which leads us to Christ alone.' Beza. This venerable writer had principally in view the additions and alterations made by popes and councils, and by the prevalence of superstition; but the modern supposed improvements of science, philosophy, and human reasonings, carry large numbers as far from Christ and from the apostolical doctrine, as popery itself does. (Notes, Col. 2:8—10,18,19.) It should also be observed, from our Lord's words, that his religion may certainly be found entire and unadulterated, in the writings of his apostles, and of those who, by their sanction, wrote the other parts of the New Testament. Indeed where else can we look for the words of the apostles? What standard of their doctrine have we, if the New Testament be not that standard? The miracles which they wrought proved the truth of Christianity: but if they were not inspired infallibly to communicate to the world the true doctrine of that holy religion without addition, adulteration, or omission; where shall we with certainty learn the nature of it? or how be sure that we are not deluded by some misrepresentation?—It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that the absurdest claims of popes and councils in this respect, and the more plausible claims of such moderns as want to improve Christianity by human reason, are maintained by the same vain supposition; namely, that the Scripture of itself is either insufficient, or in some degree uncertain, or too obscure, to answer the purpose.—In behalf, however, of all this company of believers, our Lord especially prayed, that they might be united together in the closest bonds of love; as one Body, under one Head, animated by one soul, according to the incomprehensible union before mentioned, and in virtue of their union with Christ, and the Father in him, through the Holy Spirit dwelling in them. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 14:18—24. Rom. 12:3—5. 1 Cor. 12:12—31. Gal. 3:26—29. Eph. 2:19—22. 4:1—6,11—13.) In some respects this request is granted in behalf of all true Christians, in proportion to the degree of their illumination and sanctification: but the more closely they are united in judgment and affection, and the more entirely they live in peace and harmony, professing the same doctrine, and worshipping God as with one heart and one mouth, the clearer evidence do they afford of the divine original and excellency of the gospel, to the conviction of the world around them. (Notes, 13:31—35. Jer. 32:39—41. Zeph. 3:9,10. Acts 4:32—35. 5:12—16.) On the other hand, the more those who in so many respects are one, and who are agreed in the most important matters, differ and dispute about things of inferior moment, the more ambiguous and uncertain do the truth and excellency of Christianity appear. (Notes, and P. O. Eph. 4:1—6. Note, Phil. 1:27—30.) Men are apt to say, 'It will be soon enough for us to embrace the gospel, when its professors are agreed among themselves in what it consists:' and those who are not aware of the advantage which infidels and ungodly men have made of the divisions and controversies among Christians, against the common interest of our holy religion, must have been very little acquainted with their writings, and made but few observations on the conversation and conduct of mankind. Mere nominal Christians, indeed, give the most extensive occasion to the objections; but real believers are far from being sufficiently circumspect in this particular.—The union which prevailed among Christians, when the gospel was first propagated, as springing from the communion of the Holy Spirit, the Sanctifier, evidenced to the world the divine original of Christianity, in a manner not much less convincing, than the miraculous powers of the same Spirit, conferred on them through the laying on of the hands of the apostles. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47.) And as believers are mentioned by our Lord, without limitation of age or country; the evidence to the truth of Christianity, by the miraculous gifts vouchsafed in the primitive church, cannot be particularly intended.—'This plainly intimates, that dissensions among Christians would...be the means of bringing the truth and excellence of the Christian religion into question.' Doddridge. (Notes, Matt. 18:7—9,15—17. Luke 17:3,4.)

May be one. (21) Ἐν ὦσι. 11,22,23. See on 10:30.

V. 22, 23. Our Lord could not here mean his personal or mediatorial glory: but that glory which was given to him as Mediator, to be by him conferred on his disciples; or the glory of bearing his image, declaring his truth, working miracles in confirmation of it, labouring and suffering in the same cause, and enduring enmity and opposition from ungodly men, for promoting the honour of God in the world, and finally of sharing his heavenly glory. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) Thus he gave to them the glory of concurring in that grand design, for which he became incarnate, and for which he lived and died; and of being "anointed," in their "measure, by the Holy Spirit," for that service: (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 3:27—36, v. 34. Eph. 4:7—13.) and of being thus made complete as one body in Christ, and in the Father through him: and all men might see, by their doctrine and behaviour, that they were a holy and happy people; that their religion was of heavenly original, because of a heavenly nature and tendency; and that they were the proper objects of the divine love for Christ's sake, and according to the Father's love to his "beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased." (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—'Thou, O Father, art in me, as Mediator, and I...am in them by my Spirit, working effectually in them, to unite them perfectly in one, both in themselves and in us.' Bp. Hall.—Whatever differences prevailed in the primitive church; there is not the smallest trace of any real disunion even in judgment among the apostles; except for a while, concerning the admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the church; and that matter was soon amicably settled. (Notes, Acts 11:1—17. 15:7—21.) They were all along, as far as we can learn, "perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment;" and this by an abundant measure of the illuminating and sanctifying Spirit of God; as well as by that infallible inspiration, by which they delivered the doctrine of their Lord to mankind. This was an especial honour conferred on them; and a remarkable accomplishment of this intercession considered as a prophecy. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:1—4, v. 2, 14—16. 1 John 4:1—6. Jude 17—19.)

V. 24. The language of this verse has been considered by many expositors, ancient and modern, as a claim, grounded on a covenant, the terms of which would, on the part of Christ, in a few hours be perfectly fulfilled. He does not therefore say, I pray, or beseech; but, "I will;" as acting by authority, and as One with the Father.—It is not, however, certain, that more than a fervent importunate desire was intended: and it is not advisable to adduce doubtful texts, in proof of a disputed point of doctrine. The language at least implies, that this concluding plea was peculiarly near the heart of the heavenly Advocate, and there can be no doubt it will infallibly be granted. And what is the import of it? That the whole company which had "been given him," and would in due time believe on him, should at length be safely brought to heaven, the place of his special presence as God, and whither, as man, he was about to ascend; that there they might behold and contemplate his glory as their beloved Friend and Brother, and in this beatific vision find their felicity. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 1—3, v. 2. 6—12. 6:36—40. 10:26—31. 14:2,3. Gen. 45:13. P. O. 9—28, conclusion. Notes, 2 Cor. 5:5—8. Phil. 1:19—26. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) For, in this respect, as well as on account of his divine excellency, the Father "loved him before the foundation of the world;" (Notes, 4,5. Prov. 8:22—30. Matt. 25:34—40.) because he most perfectly delighted in the mediatorial undertaking and work of the Son, as fully adequate to all the purposes of his glory in the salvation of his people.

V. 25, 26. These last verses primarily related to the apostles.—Jesus addressed God, as his "righteous Father," not only because of his essential justice, and the righteousness of his moral government; but as righteous in justifying sinners through his obedience unto death, and in performing the engagements of his everlasting covenant. (Notes, Is. 45:20—22. Rom. 3:19—26, v. 26.) The world, indeed, had not known God, in respect of this righteousness, and his glorious excellences; for it was in a state of rebellion against him, and exposed to his just vengeance on that account. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 1—3, v. 3. 8:54—59. Acts 17:22—25. Rom. 1:18—23,28—32. 1 Cor. 1:20—24. Gal. 4:8—11.) But as he,

Jesus retires to a garden; and Judas leads a company thither to apprehend him, 1—3. At the sound of Jesus' the officers, soldiers, and company fall to the ground, 4—6. Jesus, yielding up himself, requires that his disciples should be dismissed, 7—9. Peter cuts off Malchus's ear, and Jesus reproves him, 10, 11. Jesus is bound, and led away to Annas, and then to Caiaphas, 12—14. Peter is admitted in to the palace, and then denies Christ, 15—18. Jesus is examined by the high-priest, and struck by an officer, 19—24. Peter again twice denies him, 25—27. Jesus is brought before Pilate, and declares that his "kingdom is not of this world," 28—37. Pilate testifies to his innocence, and offers to release him; but the Jews prefer Barabbas, the robber, 38—40.

his beloved Son, had perfectly known him; as the apostles had assuredly believed that the Father had sent him; (Marg. Ref. x, y) and as he had declared, and would still further declare, the name and perfections of God to them by his doctrine, which would be confirmed by his Spirit: so they were, and would be, distinguished from the world, by the knowledge of God and all its happy effects; (3) in order that, being One with him, and members of his mystical body, the love of the Father to him might be communicated to them, and abide with them also; and that thus, being joined to him as one spirit, they might be filled "with all the fulness of God," and come as near the Fountain of all felicity as creatures possibly could do. (Marg. Ref. z—b. Notes, 6—10. Eph. 3:14—21.)—After all endeavours to explain this chapter, we must allow that our thoughts are swallowed up in those depths of wisdom and love, and in those mysteries of the Godhead, with which it is replete; and that the light of heaven alone can fully clear it up to us. (Note, Rom. 11: 33—36.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. Fervent prayer forms the proper conclusion of religious instructions, and the preparation for approaching trials and sufferings: and our eyes and hearts should habitually be lifted up to our heavenly Father, that he would glorify himself in and by us; prosper our endeavours to honour him; support us in resisting temptations; and carry us through all difficulties to his heavenly kingdom. (Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5—12, vv. 10—12. P. O.) But all our supplications must be presented through the intercession of our great High-Priest, who "hath power over all flesh;" and who gives eternal life to all his chosen and believing people, and will consign all unbelievers to everlasting punishment. For, however men may deny, deride, or overlook it, "eternal life" cannot be obtained by any of our fallen race, except through "the knowledge of God," as revealed in his Son Jesus, and through his meritorious obedience unto death; in which "he glorified the Father on earth," and "finished the work which was given him to do."—By leaving "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was," in his humiliation on earth, by his ascension into heaven to be reinstated in his glory, and by the doctrine which he committed to his holy apostles, he has manifested the name and glory of God to man; (6) and all believers "behold that glory as in a glass, till they are changed into the same image from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord."—This knowledge, however, widely differs from those inefficacious notions, which puff up men with pride: for it is humbling, transforming, and sanctifying; the source of all spiritual worship and holy obedience; the hope, the evidence, the earnest of eternal life, and the meetness for heavenly felicity.

V. 6—12. The special regard of the Saviour to those who were "given to him out of the world," cannot be overlooked by the attentive reader: and the things spoken of them are not peculiar to the apostles; but they take in all who receive and keep his word, who are firmly persuaded that his doctrine and his works were from the Father, and who believe in him for the salvation of their souls. For those persons, with particular purpose and design, he "came into the world;" for them he obeyed and suffered; for them he rose again and reigns; for them he continually intercedes, and not for the world at large: in them he will eternally be glorified with the Father, whose also they are; as "all things that the Father hath are" the Son's likewise. No trembling sinner, however, who desires to approach the Father, and is consciously unworthy to come in his own name, needs to be discouraged; for the Saviour is both able and willing to "save to the uttermost all them who come to God by him." These convictions and desires are hopeful tokens; and when they lead a man to the throne of grace, through faith in the word, and reliance on the intercession of Emmanuel; the express promises of God become his security, and the work already wrought in him evidences that he has been "chosen unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth;" nor can any one, whatever he professes or preaches, know his election of God, except by that "faith which worketh by love," and by its evident fruits. (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—4, vv. 3, 4. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.)—For many have called Christ Lord and Master, and seemed to be the children and servants of God, who at length proved "sons of perdition," after the example of Judas. Such examples should excite us to serious self-examination and fervent prayer: but they should not distress the humble believer, who, though he "cannot do the things that he would," is conscious of integrity in his professed repentance, and faith in Christ, and desire of living to his glory. These are of that number, who, through the intercession of Christ, shall be "kept by the power of God," to the glory of his name, and in his worship and service, "through faith, unto eternal salvation." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) None of them ever were or will be lost: for "the sons of perdition" only seemed to be of them, but they never were one with them in judgment, disposition, and affection. (Note, 1 John 2:18, 19.)

V. 13—19. The true disciples of Christ live at present in an ensnaring and evil world, which hates and despises them: yet the recollection of his words, and the experience of his faithfulness, may fill them with holy joy in him and in each other, amidst all their tribulations. They should indeed be willing to die, but not impatiently desire it: for their loving Advocate does not intercede for their immediate removal out of the world, but that they "may be kept from the evil of it." They must, however, carefully remember, that they are not left here to pursue any of those objects which the men of the world are pursuing; but to glorify God, to "serve their generation," to finish their work, and "to be perfected through sufferings," after the example of "the Captain of their salvation." They should therefore hope and pray, that the grace which has separated them from the world, may preserve them from the evil of it, and from the snares of the wicked one; they should seek to be sanctified more and more through the word of truth, that they may be devoted unreservedly to the service of him, who "through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God," for their sakes, and "to purge their consciences from dead works, that they might serve the living God:" (Note, Heb. 9:11—14, vv. 13,14.) and they should carefully examine, whether the doctrines which they hold have a sanctifying effect upon their own hearts and lives. For, as all divine truth is of a holy nature, if our religious opinions do not make us hate all sin, and long and pray for holiness, we may be sure, either that they are not divine truths, or that we do not receive them by a living faith, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

V. 20—26. Blessed be God, that we sinners, in these remote regions and distant ages, are interested in this prayer of our Redeemer, if we truly believe in him according to the word of his holy apostles! May we continually recollect, that union and communion with the Father and the Son, by the in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit, and union, peace, and harmony with one another, formed the substance of our Redeemer's prayer for all his disciples, to the end of time. Let us then "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" and let us pray with fervour, and without ceasing, for a larger portion of divine illumination, in behalf of ourselves and of all our brethren, that we may all be united "in one mind and judgment." Let us also constantly beseech our God to bestow on us far more abundance of holy love; that we may amicably differ in opinion, where we cannot see things exactly in the same light. Thus a spirit of mutual candour, forbearance, and active self-denying kindness, among "all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," may convince the world that we are of one heart and soul, though somewhat separated by external circumstances; and that we are all soldiers in one army, though not exactly marshalled and disciplined in the same manner; that we are indeed fighting against sin, the world, and the devil; and that we will not be seduced to turn our arms against each other, as has too often been the case, to the joy and triumph of our insulting enemies. Thus we shall best manifest the truth and excellency of our religion, and the divine authority of its great Author. Thus we shall experience more intimate union of soul, and more sweet and sanctifying communion with the God of our salvation, and with his saints. Thus we shall have a measure of the Redeemer's glory conferred on us, by being conformed to his image, united with his people, and hated by those only who "hate him and the Father that sent him." Thus at length we shall surely be with him for ever, to behold his glory, and enjoy, as one with him, that love with which the Father "loved him before the foundation of the world;" and shall possess the most complete felicity, in the full knowledge of that glorious God whom the world has not known; but in knowing whom angels and archangels find blessedness, of which in our present state we can frame no adequate conception. (Notes, 1 Cor. 2:6—9. 13:8—12. 1 John 3:1—3, v. 3.)

30—56. Mark 14:26—50. Luke 22:39—53.)—Cedron, or Kidron, was a small brook to the east of Jerusalem, over which David (the type of Christ) passed weeping, when he fled for fear of Absalom. (Marg. Ref. c. Note, 2 Sam. 15:23.) It derived its name from a shady and gloomy valley through which it ran.—It is probable, that the garden to which Jesus retired, belonged to some friend, who willingly and gladly afforded him and his disciples this quiet retreat. But Judas, knowing his custom and purpose of resorting thither, had procured a cohort of Roman soldiers, as well as the officers of the Jewish rulers, in order to take him: and they came with every preparation which would have been necessary if they had attempted to apprehend some desperate criminal, attended with numerous armed followers, who would use every method to oppose or to escape them: otherwise lanterns and torches seem not to have been needful, when the moon was at the full. (Marg. Ref. a, b, d—g.)—The first Adam fell in a garden; the second Adam began the last scene of his atoning sufferings in a garden likewise.

See on Matt. 27:27.

V. 4—9. John is entirely silent as to our Lord's agony in the garden, which had been fully stated by the three preceding evangelists: (Notes, Matt. 26:36—46. Mark 14:32—42. Luke 22:39—46.) and he proceeds to mention circumstances respecting the apprehending of Jesus, which they had passed over. Our Lord, though fully aware of all the inexpressible sufferings which were coming upon him, and every circumstance of them, went forth to meet his rude assailants, with the most perfect serenity and fortitude! (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, 13:1—5, vv. 1,3. Luke 9:51—56, v. 51. Acts 20:22—24. 21:7—14.) It is particularly remarked, that Judas stood with the company, when Jesus declared himself to be the person whom they sought; so that he too was constrained to go "backward, and fall to the ground:" yet he was not dismayed by that further display of the power of his Lord, but dared to proceed with his horrid purpose! (Marg. Ref. i—m. Note, Ps. 27:1—3, v. 2.) No doubt Jesus could with equal ease have struck the whole company dead in a moment: and it is wonderful, that the scribes, priests, and other Jews did not recollect the companies which were destroyed by fire from heaven when they came to take Elijah; and that they should venture to renew their attempt after this unexpected repulse. (Notes, 11:47,48. 12:9—11. 2 Kings 1:9—14. Luke 9:51—56, v. 54.) But perhaps they ascribed it to the same power by which the Pharisees asserted that he wrought his miracles: and if so, they might deem their preservation a peculiar interposition of God in their favour. (Note, Ec. 9:1—3, v. 3.) Our Lord, however, was pleased not to proceed any further against them; but only observed, that as they sought him who was ready to yield up himself, they should let his disciples go away unmolested; and with this they were influenced to comply. This conduct of Jesus accorded to the word, which he had before spoken: (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, 17:11,12.) for he thus not only showed the most tender concern for their temporal safety, as given to him to be his apostles: but he kept them, as true but weak believers, from those temptations which they were not then prepared to withstand; and this conduced also to their spiritual preservation. (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. 1 Cor. 10:13.)

—Knowing, &c. (4) 'Our Lord not only knew, in general, that he should suffer some great evil, and even death itself; but was acquainted also with all the particular circumstances of ignominy and horror that should attend his sufferings.... It is impossible to enter aright into the heroic behaviour of our Lord Jesus Christ, without carrying this circumstance along with us. The critics are in raptures at the gallantry of Achilles, in going to the Trojan war, when he knew, according to Homer, that he should fall there. But he must have a very low way of thinking, who does not see infinitely more fortitude in our Lord's conduct on this occasion.' Doddridge. —Fell to the ground, &c. The most corrupt heart has its reasonings, to support it in its absurdest notions, and most criminal actions.' Ibid.—To the ground. (6) Χαμαι. 9:6.

V. 10—14. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Matt. 26:47—56. Luke 22:47—53.) John alone of the evangelists mentions Peter and Malchus by name; for probably Peter had suffered martyrdom before John wrote his gospel.—It must have been the effect of a secret divine interposition, that the officers and soldiers permitted the disciples to withdraw quietly, after this violent resistance.—The question proposed by our Lord, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" was peculiarly beautiful and expressive. He did not confine his thoughts to the malice and injustice of his enemies in his sufferings; but he received them as a cup put into his hand by his heavenly Father, who would not afflict him without good reason, and for the most gracious and important purposes. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 20:20—23. 26:36—39, v. 39. Mark 14:32—36, v. 36.)—Caiaphas seems to have obtained the high-priesthood by the interest of Annas, who possessed it before him. The officers of the council led Jesus first to Annas, out of deference to his character; but he sent them back to Caiaphas, to whom Jesus was evidently brought before the events which are next recorded. (Marg. Ref. t—a. Notes, 11:49—53. Luke 3:2,3.) 'Of his being sent to Annas, the other Evangelists say nothing; because nothing was done to Christ there; but all was performed in the palace of the high-priest.' Whitby.

The captain. (12) 'Ο χιλιαρχος. Mark 6:21. Acts 21:31, 32,33,37. Rev. 6:15. 19:18. Α χιλιας, mille. The captain spoken of was commander of a thousand men, though probably only a part of that number was present.—'At the time of the passover, it was customary for the Roman president to send a whole band of a thousand men, for a guard to the temple; the captain of which band is here called Χιλιαρχος.' Whitby.

V. 15, 16. (Note, Matt. 26:57—62.) Many expositors have supposed, that this other disciple was John the evangelist: yet, as John was a fisherman of Galilee, it is not probable that he should be acquainted with the high-priest, and have influence with his servants: and indeed it is not said that this disciple was one of the apostles. It is therefore more likely, that some person residing at Jerusalem, and of rank superior to the apostles, was intended; that he on this occasion avowed himself the disciple of Jesus; and, having entered with him into the palace of the high-priest, procured admission for Peter, who had before been excluded.—Nonnus, an ancient Greek author, renders it, 'and another new friend.' 'He seems not to have been John: for he being a Galilean, as well as Peter, they might have equally suspected him on that account.' Whitby.

[a]who had made a fire of coals; ([b]for it was cold;) and they warmed themselves: and [c]Peter stood with them, and warmed himself.

19 ¶ The high-priest then [d]asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his doctrine.

20 Jesus answered him, [e]I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; [f]and in secret have I said nothing.

21 Why askest thou me? [g]ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said.

22 And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by, [h]struck Jesus with [i]the palm of his hand, saying, [k]Answerest thou the high-priest so?

23 Jesus answered him, [l]If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?

24 (Now [m]Annas had sent him [n]bound unto Caiaphas the high-priest.)

25 And Simon Peter [o]stood and warmed himself. [p]They said therefore unto him, Art not thou also one of his disciples? [q]he denied it, and said, I am not.

26 One of the servants of the high-priest, ([r]being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off,) saith, [s]Did not I see thee in the garden with him?

27 Peter then denied again; [t]and immediately the cock crew.

28 ¶ Then [u]led they Jesus from Caiaphas [v]unto the [w]hall of judgment: and it was [x]early; [y]and they themselves went not into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might [z]eat the passover.

29 Pilate then went out unto them, and said, [a]What accusation bring ye against this man?

30 They answered and said unto him, [b]If he were not a malefactor, we would not have [c]delivered him up unto thee.

31 Then said Pilate unto them, [d]Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, [e]It is not lawful for us to put any man to death:

32 That [f]the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying [g]what death he should die. [Practical Observations.]

33 Then Pilate entered into the judgment-hall again, and called Jesus, [h]and said unto him, Art thou [i]the King of the Jews?

34 Jesus answered him, [k]Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?

35 Pilate answered, [l]Am I a Jew? [m]Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me. [n]What hast thou done?

36 Jesus answered, [o]My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, [p]then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence.

V. 19—23. (Notes, Matt. 26:63—68. Mark 14:53—59. Luke 22:63—71.) It is probable, that Caiaphas questioned Jesus concerning the number and rank of his disciples; but to this he answered nothing. He also inquired of him, what doctrine he had taught the people; with reference, either to his assuming the character of the Messiah, or to the contrariety of his doctrine to the traditions of the elders. To this Jesus replied, that he had taught the people in the most frequented places, and the most open manner, and had spoken nothing in private different from his public instructions. It was not therefore proper to require his testimony in his own cause, as they were not disposed to believe it; but that regard to due order, or to law and justice, required them to seek for witnesses among those who had heard him. It is most likely that some were then present, who had frequently heard his instructions. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) This reply was peculiarly suitable to the situation in which Jesus was at this time placed; for he stood as a prisoner on his trial, before judges who were determined to put him to death, and only sought a pretence for their injustice and murder. An officer, however, of the court, imagining on false grounds that he answered the high-priest in a disrespectful manner, contumeliously smote him with the palm of his hand, or rather with a rod, or wand of office. (Notes, Mic. 5:1. Mark 14:60—65, v. 65.) But Jesus meekly replied, by observing, that if on that, or any other occasion, he had spoken any thing criminal, let him bear witness against him; but if he had answered well, and his words were not faulty, why did he smite him, when he was on his trial in a court, where justice ought to be administered to every one? It was proper, that this man should be rebuked for his ill-behaviour, and that the imputation of blame should be done away from our Lord's character; though he was ready to endure every indignity and cruelty, without resistance or menace. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Acts 16:35—40. 23:1—5.)

V. 24—27. Marg. Ref. Notes, 10—14. Matt. 26:69—75. Mark 14:66—72. Luke 22:54—62.

V. 28—32. (Notes, Matt. 27:1,2,11—18. Mark 15:1—5. Luke 23:1—12.) "The hall of judgment," (Marg.) or the pretorium, was a part of the Roman governor's palace; in which causes were generally decided, and perhaps some appendages of idolatry were seen there. The Jewish rulers therefore feared, lest they should contract ritual defilement if they went into it; and thus be prevented from eating of the sacrifices offered on the first day of unleavened bread, which were supposed to be an essential part of the feast of the passover. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 13:18—30, v. 29. 19:13—18. 2 Chr. 30:21—25, 35:7—19. Ez. 45:18—25.) Thus they were scrupulous and zealous in externals; and were purposing to join in sacred ordinances; when they were trampling under foot every obligation of piety, justice, and mercy! (Notes, Ps. 35:15,16. Is. 1:10—15. Matt. 23:23,24.)—Pilate, however, condescended to humour them in their scruples; and therefore he went out to them to demand what accusation they brought against Jesus. He must have known many things respecting the character and reported miracles of Jesus; but he did not wish to interpose. The rulers, therefore, considered his question as an insinuation against their equity; and they replied with a degree of displeasure, that they would not have condemned him, and delivered him to be put to death, if he had not been a malefactor deserving of so heavy a punishment. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) Thus they in fact required Pilate to believe Jesus guilty, on their bare word; and without hesitation to give orders for his execution! But he, probably not approving of such a summary method of procedure, and not willing to interfere without necessity, and yet averse to giving them offence, desired them to settle the matter by their own authority, and to judge and punish Jesus by their own law. It is not agreed how far the authority of the Jewish courts at this time extended: but it seems evident, that they were not allowed, except under some restrictions, to inflict capital punishment, without sanction from the Roman governor; and no other sentence could gratify their virulent malice against Jesus. Nor did they choose to interpret Pilate's permission as a warrant to put him to death; lest he or his successors should afterwards take some advantage of it against them. Thus the words of Jesus, concerning his being lifted up from the earth, and being crucified, were fulfilled: for if the Jews had put him to death, they would have stoned him as a blasphemer. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 3:14,15. 12:27—33, vv. 32,33. Matt. 20:17—19.)

V. 33—36. After the rulers had acknowledged that they had no authority to put any man to death, Pilate returned into the judgment-hall to examine Jesus more privately: probably induced by what he had heard of his character and conduct, and what he now witnessed of his meek, calm, and firm deportment. Especially he inquired, if indeed he avowed himself "the King of the Jews;" for this would be adjudged an act of treason against the Roman emperor. And 37 Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a King then? Jesus answered, [u]Thou sayest that I am a King. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, [x]that I should bear witness unto the truth. [y]Every one that is of the truth, heareth my voice.

38 Pilate saith unto him, [z]What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, [a]I find in him no fault at all.

39 But [b]ye have a custom, that I should release unto you one at the passover: will ye therefore that [c]I release unto you the King of the Jews?

40 Then [d]cried they all again, saying, Not this man, but Barabbas. Now Barabbas was a robber.

when Jesus asked, whether he made this inquiry from his own opinion of his conduct; or merely because others had informed him that he laid claim to this character; he replied, that he was no Jew, and knew nothing of their sentiments concerning the expected Messiah, with some disdain of the idea of being a Jew. The priests and rulers of his own nation were the persecutors of Jesus, and therefore Pilate desired to know, by what crimes he had excited their suspicion, or indignation. (Marg. Ref. m—x.) Jesus then intimated, that he was a King; but that his "kingdom was not of this world:" it had nothing to do with men's temporal interests or privileges; it left rulers and subjects in the same situation as it found them; and it was therefore no object of jealousy to any government. Had he claimed a kingdom of an earthly nature, he would of course have armed his followers, and they would have fought in his cause: but as his disciples had been few in number, inoffensive in their habits, and forbidden to fight for him, even when he was apprehended; it was evident that his kingdom was not of a secular nature, but related wholly to spiritual and heavenly things, and would be supported entirely by spiritual sanctions and authority. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10—14.)—The multitudes, that followed Christ when he entered Jerusalem, would have readily fought for him, if he had claimed a temporal kingdom: and they seem to have been set against him because he would not. V. 37—40. Pilate next asked, whether Jesus professed to be King in any sense. To which he answered, by assenting to Pilate's proposition, that he was a King, that is, of Israel: and he averred that he was born for that end; that he came into the world to bear witness to the truth of God, in this and every other particular; and that every one who belonged to the truth, and was disposed to comply with it, heard and obeyed his voice; though his nation in general rejected and opposed him. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Note, 1 Tim. 6:13—16, v. 13.)—This reply caused Pilate to exclaim, "What is truth?" But it is not certain whether he did it out of curiosity, or in derision, or from some impression of reverence to the character and behaviour of Jesus. As, however, he did not immediately answer; he went out, declaring to the Jews his full conviction that Jesus was entirely innocent, as to the crimes of which he had been accused. Yet, since they had delivered him up as a malefactor, he proposed by a customary act of grace at that festival, to release to them their inoffensive King; by which means the people would be satisfied; and the rulers would be exempted from censure, for the part which they had taken in his prosecution.—But they all, both priests and rulers, and the people who had assembled on this occasion, clamorously preferred the robber Barabbas to him! PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. Even the rancorous malice of our Lord's enemies did not render them more eager to apprehend and crucify him, than his love to perishing sinners made him ready to meet all those sufferings, which he knew were coming on him, that he might effect their salvation! All the power of earth and hell could not, for a moment, have resisted his omnipotence, if he had seen good to exert it: (Note, 10:14—18.) but he only alarmed, and did not injure, his assailants; for that was the day of his patience and meekness, as our Surety and Example. Yet "the day of his wrath" will come, when all who oppose, yea, all who do not obey, his gospel, shall be driven backward, and perish for ever. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) In the mean time he spares and warns his adversaries: yet neither his terror, nor his forbearance, will deter men in general from their purpose; or from pursuing worldly things, in contempt of his salvation, and in defiance of his vengeance.—But he most tenderly regards the temporal peace and safety, as well as the eternal interests, of his faithful disciples: he proportions their trials to their strength; nor will he ever require them to bear such sufferings for him, as he bare for them, or any at all comparable to them.

V. 10—32. From the example of our Saviour we should learn to receive our lighter afflictions, as "a cup which our Father has given us to drink;" and to resist every temptation to escape suffering by sin, or to murmur and despond under it; by asking ourselves, whether we ought thus to oppose our Father's will, or to distrust his love.—Self-confident rashness is very different from the steady courage and patience of faith: and they who most readily venture into temptation, are often most easily overcome by it.—The company of profane and wicked men either corrupts or dismays those pious persons who are seduced into it; and they soon forget their purposes and resolution, and conform to the humour, or try to shun the reproach, of their companions. We should therefore watch and pray against temptation, and get as far out of the way of them as we can: but humiliating experience of our own weakness is commonly necessary to teach us caution and attention to the words of Christ. As he suffered every insult for the sake of Peter, even when Peter was basely denying him; so he foresaw all our unfaithfulness and ingratitude, at the time when he shed his blood for our sins! This consideration should not only encourage our hope in his boundless mercy, but also shame us out of our base requitals of so gracious a Benefactor.—The most perfect meekness, patience, and wisdom, of the Son of God, only served to increase the outrageous enmity of his persecutors; and their base usage reciprocally illustrated his consummate excellency. This should teach us what to expect from the wicked, and how to behave towards them. (Note, and P. O. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.)—So blind are men in things pertaining to the acceptable worship and service of God, that they often expect to please him by exactness in externals, while they are deliberately perpetrating the basest iniquities! Nay, they hope to atone for their murders and oppressions, by hypocritical forms of godliness!—Those who are most scandalously unjust, frequently expect most credit for their strict regard to justice; and are greatly affronted to be suspected of the least crime, whilst they are actually committing the greatest. (Notes, 2 Sam. 20:8—10,20—22.) But the malice even of the worst of men is so overruled as to fulfil the words of Jesus, and to accomplish the wise and holy purposes of God.

V. 33—40. We should always remember, that "the kingdom of Christ is not of this world:" it cannot then be promoted by carnal weapons or means of any kind, or by any party; nor accommodated to any temporal interests; and every attempt of this kind is inconsistent, unscriptural, and unholy. For our Saviour and King reigns in the heart and conscience of his true subjects: the princes of this world have nothing to fear from the obedience of Christians to his authority; nor does he need the countenance of their's, though he may see good sometimes to make use of it. His subjects are commanded to "render tribute to whom tribute is due, and honour to whom honour;" to "submit to the powers that be;" to "fear God and the king, and not to meddle with those who are given to change:" though, at the same time, they must "obey God rather than man," when man presumes to interfere out of his own province. It would greatly promote the credit of the gospel, if all the professed subjects of Christ, whilst they stand up for the right of liberty of conscience, would be careful to render a conscientious obedience to these plain precepts in this matter. Then they would more resemble him, "who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession;" and prove themselves to be "of the truth," by hearing and obeying his voice.—But many profess to inquire after truth, who are not disposed to wait for an answer, or to welcome that which is given by those who "speak as the oracles of God." Numbers give Jesus and his people a good word, who will not join them, or venture any thing in his cause: numbers commit injustice for fear of their own dependants, and from a desire of popularity; and the majority of all ranks, even of nominal Christians, still in fact prefer Barabbas to Christ; so that it requires more constancy than unregenerate men possess, to stem the torrent of impetuous wickedness. Let us, however, look to "the Lamb of God" in whom the Roman governor could "find no fault at all:" let us endeavour in the same manner to make all our accusers ashamed: let us never indulge prejudices against persons or doctrines, because multitudes decry them: and let us beware of deliberately sparing our lusts, (those robbers of God, and murderers of the soul,) and thus "crucifying Christ afresh, and putting him to open shame."

NOTES.—CHAP. XIX. V. 1—7. (Note, Matt. 27:26—31. Mark 15:11—20, v. 20.) John seems to record our Lord's being scourged and crowned with thorns, in the exact order of time in which these events occurred. Perhaps Pilate

CHAPTER XIX.

Jesus is scourged, crowned with thorns, and mocked by the soldiers, 1—3. Pilate declaring his innocence, the Jews charge him with calling himself the "Son of God," 4—7. Pilate, after further examination, desires to release him; but, overcome with the clamours of the Jews, delivers him to be crucified. 8—16. He is led to Golgotha, and crucified between two robbers, 17, 18. The title placed over his cross, which Pilate refuses to alter, 19—22. The soldiers part his garments, 23, 24. Jesus affectionately commends his mother to the care of John, 25—27; and, receiving vinegar to drink, he expires, 28—30. The legs of the robbers are broken to hasten their death: but Jesus being previously dead, his side is pierced by a soldier, and thus the Scriptures are fulfilled, 31—37. Joseph of Arimathea, assisted by Nicodemus, buries him. 38—42.

THEN [a]Pilate therefore took Jesus, and [b]scourged him.

2 And [c]the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on him a purple robe,

3 And said, [d]Hail, [e]King of the Jews! and they smote him with their hands.

4 ¶ Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, [f]that ye may know that I find no fault in him.

5 Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, [g]Behold the man!

6 When [h]the chief priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, [i]Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him.

7 The Jews answered him, [k]We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, [l]because he made himself the Son of God.

8 ¶ When Pilate therefore [m]heard that saying, he was the more afraid;

9 And went again into the judgment-hall, and saith unto Jesus, [n]Whence art thou? [o]But Jesus gave him no answer.

10 Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? [p]knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?

11 Jesus answered, [q]Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore [r]he that delivered me unto thee hath [s]the greater sin.

12 And [t]from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, [u]thou art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar.

13 ¶ When Pilate therefore [x]heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, [y]and sat down in the judgment-seat, in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha.

14 And it was [z]the preparation of the passover, and about [a]the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, [b]Behold your King!

15 But they cried out, [c]Away with him, away hoped, that by severely scourging Jesus, and allowing the soldiers to treat him with cruel mockery, the rulers of the Jews might be induced to consent to his release: or, that the compassion of the multitude would be excited, and so they might be influenced to prefer him to Barabbas. He therefore brought him forth arrayed in a purple robe, and crowned with thorns, and probably covered with his own blood: and, having repeated his full conviction of his entire innocence, he said to them, "Behold the man:" (Marg. Ref. a—g.) 'Consider whether he be not rather an object of compassion or contempt, than of jealousy, envy, and hatred.' This is not mentioned in the other gospels, in which the next circumstance to that of the soldiers scourging and mocking Jesus is, "They took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him."—But the events here recorded, occurred after the mocking of Jesus by the soldiers, and before they took off the robe.—The rulers, however, were too full of enmity and malice to be moved by the spectacle: and perhaps fearing lest it should affect the common people differently, they and their attending officers became still more clamorous in demanding his immediate crucifixion. This seems to have greatly displeased Pilate; and therefore he bade them take Jesus "and crucify him:" seeing he found no fault in his whole conduct. 'If you will have it so, do it yourselves at your peril; for I cannot condemn a man without a fault.' Grotius. This reply induced them to add the charge of blasphemy to that of rebellion against the Roman authority; that if Pilate would not condemn him as a traitor, he might consent to his death, as justly condemned for blasphemy by their law. V. 8—12. It would be vain, and it is not needful, particularly to inquire what thoughts were excited in Pilate's mind on this occasion. He seems, however, to have been impressed with an apprehension that Jesus might probably be some extraordinary person, very high in favour with the superior powers; and that it would be dangerous to proceed further against him: and the mild dignity and gravity of his behaviour, amidst all the insults and cruelties which he experienced, might tend to confirm this opinion. (Note, Matt. 27: 19—23.) He therefore said unto Jesus, "Whence art thou?" of earthly or of heavenly origin? But our Lord gave him no answer. Pilate was no competent judge in a question of this kind: and his unjust conduct, in allowing such cruelties to be exercised on a person whom he knew to be innocent, rendered him unworthy of further regard. The silence of our Lord, however, seems to have astonished and displeased Pilate; who haughtily inquired how it was that he refused to speak to him, when he knew that he had an unrestrained authority, either to order him to immediate crucifixion, or to release him. (Note, Matt. 27:11—18.) Jesus, therefore, showed him, that he had this power from above, even from the God of heaven, and would be called to an account for his use of it; nor indeed could he at all have employed it against him, if God had not for wise reasons seen good to permit it. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Notes, 3:27—36, v. 27. Ex. 9:13—17. Ps. 62:11,12. 76:10. Matt. 6:13.) There was a peculiar propriety in stating this general truth, when the application of it was made to the Lord of life and glory, now delivered up into the hands of an idolater, who was about to abuse his authority by condemning him to be crucified.—As our Lord suffered for the sins of both Jews and Gentiles; it was a special part of the counsel of infinite wisdom, that the Jews should first purpose his death, and that the Gentiles should carry that purpose into execution.—But, though Pilate was about to contract very great guilt by condemning him; Caiaphas, who at the head of the Jewish council had delivered up the promised Messiah into the hands of idolaters, had much deeper criminality: as his situation enabled him to know far more of the true God and his law, as well as to have more acquaintance with the doctrine and miracles of Jesus; and as the conduct of the high-priest, and all concerned with him in that prosecution, resulted from far more determinate enmity to the truth, holiness, and authority of God, than Pilate's did. This answer, however, was a solemn warning to Pilate to beware what he did in such a case: and he seems to have understood and felt it in some degree; so that he became the more desirous to release him. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—But the rulers, finding that their last accusation rather obstructed than forwarded the completion of their design, endeavoured next to terrify Pilate into compliance, by declaring that he could not be sincerely attached to the interests of the Roman emperor, if he neglected to punish a man, who, by aspiring to the kingdom, must be deemed Cæsar's competitor and enemy. The jealous tyranny and cruelty of Tiberius Cæsar, who was then emperor, are well known; and Pilate, probably fearing lest some spies should carry an accusation against him to Rome, immediately yielded to their injustice. (Marg. Ref. u.)—'Pilate's conscience fighteth for Christ: but straightway it yielded; because it is not upholden by the singular power of God.' Beza. (Notes, Prov. 29:25,26. Matt. 10:27,28. 1 John 5:4,5.)—'This chiefly moved him, because, as Tacitus and Suetonius observe, Tiberias was apt to suspect the worst: and the least crimes with him made a man guilty of death, if they related to the government. Pilate durst not, therefore, venture that this charge should be laid against him by the Jews.' Whitby.

V. 13—18. (Notes, Matt. 27:24,25,32—35. Luke 23:26—31.) Pilate having ascended his tribunal, which was not in the judgment-hall, but in a more public place called "the Pavement," or "Gabbatha," proceeded to pass sentence on with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The chief priests answered, [d]We have no king but Cæsar.

16 Then [e]delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified. And they took Jesus and led him away.

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ And he [f]bearing his cross [g]went forth into a place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew [h]Golgotha

18 Where [i]they crucified him, and two others with him, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst.

19 ¶ And Pilate [k]wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, [l]JESUS OF NAZARETH THE KING OF THE JEWS.

20 This title then read many of the Jews: for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city: and it was written [m]in Hebrew, [n]and Greek, and Latin.

21 Then said the chief priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews; but that he said, I am King of the Jews.

22 Pilate answered, [o]What I have written I have written.

23 Then [p]the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, [r]woven from the top throughout.

24 They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: [q]that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, [r]They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did.

25 ¶ Now there stood by the cross of Jesus, [s]his mother, [t]and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of [t]Cleophas, [u]and Mary Magdalene.

26 When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, [x]whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, [y]Woman, behold thy son!

27 Then saith he to the disciple, [z]Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple [a]took her unto [b]his own home.

28 ¶ After this, [c]Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, [d]that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst.

29 Now [e]there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon [f]hyssop, and put it to his mouth.

30 When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, [g]It is finished: [h]and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

Jesus. The Evangelist observes, that "it was the preparation of the Passover," or the day before the solemn sabbath, which occured on the second day of unleavened bread; (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 31—37. Lev. 23:5—8.) for which the people ought to have been making preparation, though many of them were far otherwise employed.—It was also "about the sixth hour." As there is no reason to think that St. John computed time in a different manner from the other Evangelists; as six o'clock, (according to the Roman computation,) or soon after sunrise, must have been much too early for all the events which preceded our Lord's crucifixion to have occurred that morning; as St. Mark has expressly mentioned the third hour, or nine o'clock, for the time of that event, to which the accounts of the other Evangelists accord; (Note, Mark 15:25.) and as the sixth hour, or noon, (according to the Jewish computation,) would be too late to agree with the parallel Scriptures: so it seems the most easy way of solving the difficulty, to suppose that sixth, instead of third, was inserted by some of the early transcribers of this gospel. The mistake would be very trivial, and very easily fallen into; and in a few places it is necessary to allow that something of this kind has happened. Indeed some manuscripts read "the third hour." Pilate, however, again pointed out the suffering Jesus to the implacable Jews, saying, "Behold your King!" perhaps in scorn of them; as if a King crowned with thorns, and covered with stripes, befitted such a people. When they still persisted in demanding his crucifixion; he asked them, whether he should "crucify their King:" and though on other occasions, they had many doubts and objections even concerning the lawfulness of submitting, or paying tribute, to the Roman emperor; yet to gratify their malice, they at once exclaimed, that they had "no king but Cæsar." (Note, Gen. 49:10.) Upon which Pilate, perhaps deeming this concession, from so turbulent a people, of considerable importance, got over all his scruples, and delivered up Jesus to be crucified. (Marg. Ref. b—i.)—'Josephus ... expressly assures us, that Pilate having slain a considerable number of seditious Samaritans, was deposed from his government by Vitellius, and sent to Tiberias at Rome, who died before he arrived there. And Eusebius tells us,... that quickly after, (having, as others say, been banished to Vienne, in Gaul,) he laid violent hands on himself, falling on his own sword. Agrippa, who was an eyewitness to many of his enormities, speaks of him in his oration to Caius Cæsar, as one who had been a man of a most infamous character.... Probably, the accusations of other Jews, following him, had before that proved his destruction.' Doddridge.

V. 19—22. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, Matt. 27:37,38.) The three languages, in which this inscription was written, were more generally understood than any other at that time; and most persons present would be capable of reading it in some one of them: so that this was, in fact, to publish to the nations of the earth that Jesus the Nazarene was the King of Israel, the expected Messiah. It is not therefore wonderful that it gave umbrage to the Jewish rulers, as it seemed to imply, that they had enviously and maliciously persecuted to death their promised Messiah: and probably Pilate intended it as a reflection upon them. He was, however, so put out of humour, by being compelled to condemn an innocent man contrary to his judgment and conscience, that he would not gratify them, in allowing the inscription to be altered; which was doubtless owing to a secret power of God upon his heart, in order that this attestation of our Lord's character and authority might continue.—Perhaps the open insults which the chief priests and rulers used, as Jesus hung upon the cross, might in part be intended, by ridiculing his pretensions, to counteract the effects of this inscription, on the minds of the people. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, Ps. 22:11—15. 69:16—21. Matt. 27:32—44. Mark 15:29—32.)—Was near the city. (20) The place of our Lord's crucifixion and sepulture, as shown to traveller's at present, is within the city. If then the right place be shown, as it seems probable, the site of Jerusalem must have been considerably altered in the lapse of so many ages.

V. 23, 24. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. 22:16—18. Matt. 27:35,36.) It is not, I believe, clearly known, in what way a garment was so formed in the loom, as to need no seam in any part of it. Very probably, this vesture was the work of some of those women who ministered to our Lord; and it seems to have been considered, as both curious and valuable.

V. 25—27. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t, u.) The inward anguish, and the conflicting thoughts and affections, with which the mind of Mary must have been agitated, on this most distressing occasion, can never be described or imagined. (Note, Luke 2:33—35.) But, considering all the expectations excited by the conception, birth, and infancy of Jesus, and all the miracles, and other extraordinary circumstances of his public ministry, she could scarcely doubt, even when she saw him expire on the cross, that he was the promised "Messiah, the King of Israel." (Notes, Matt. 1:18—25. 2: Luke 1:26—45. 2:) After Joseph's death and our Lord's entrance on his ministry, it is probable that Mary had generally attended him: and being now present to behold his crucifixion, Jesus, amidst all his own sufferings, was tenderly mindful of her; and by turning her attention to John, the beloved disciple, as one who would be as a son to her, and whom she should love, for his sake, as her own son; and by mentioning her to him as his "mother," to whom he was to perform the duty of that relation for his sake: he effectually influenced John to take her to him, and to provide for her, and treat her with all respect and affection, as long as she lived. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, 2:1—5. Matt. 12:46—50.) How long that was, or where John from that time resided, we are not informed in Scripture; and history gives us little information which can be depended on.

31 ¶ The Jews therefore, [h]because it was the preparation, [k]that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day, (for [l]that sabbath-day was a high day,) besought Pilate that [m]their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.

32 Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs [n]of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him.

33 But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs.

34 But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith [o]came thereout blood and water.

35 And [p]he that saw it bare record and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, [q]that ye might believe.

36 For these things were done, [r]that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken.

37 And again another scripture saith, [s]They shall look on him whom they pierced.

38 ¶ And after this, [t]Joseph of Arimathea, (being a disciple of Jesus, [u]but secretly for fear of the Jews,) besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus: and Pilate gave him leave. He came therefore, and took the body of Jesus.

39 And there came also [x]Nicodemus, (which at the first came to Jesus by night,) and brought [y]a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pound weight.

40 Then took they the body of Jesus, and [z]wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury.

41 Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; [a]and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid.

42 There [b]laid they Jesus therefore, [c]because of the Jews' preparation-day; for the sepulchre was nigh at hand.

V. 28—30. All our Lord's expiatory sufferings were now on the very point of being finished; but in order to the fulfilment of some other scriptures, he said, "I thirst:" and his exquisite torture, fatigue, and heat, doubtless caused his thirst to be very intense. (Notes, Ps. 22:14,15. 69:21.) Probably this was immediately after he had cried out, "Eli, Eli, &c." for this evangelist generally records other circumstances even of the same events, than the others do: and so this word, "I thirst," induced some present to offer him vinegar, while others waited to see whether Elias would come to save him. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, Matt. 27:32—34,46—50. Mark 15:34—39. Luke 23:44—49.)—When Jesus, by receiving and tasting the vinegar, had accomplished these predictions also, he said, "It is finished." All that the prophets had foretold; all that the types prefigured; all that the justice of God required, as an atonement for sin, in order to the reconciliation of sinners to himself; all that the honour of his law and government demanded; and whatever was necessary for the glory of all the divine perfections, in man's salvation, was now completely finished: and so was the victory over Satan, sin, the world, and death, as far as our Lord's personal obedience and sufferings were concerned.—Probably, the inward darkness and anguish, which began to oppress our Lord's mind in the garden, at this moment were finally dispersed; and thus he expired in the clear perception and full enjoyment of the light of his Father's countenance. V. 31—37. The law of Moses required that the bodies of such malefactors as were hanged on a tree, should be taken down the same day; (Note, Deut. 21:22,23.) and, though the Romans frequently left the bodies of those whom they crucified upon their crosses, till they were consumed, or devoured by birds of prey; yet they seem to have generally allowed the Jews to bury such as belonged to them, when it was certain that they were dead; which sometimes was not till the next day, or even later. But the rulers (though not deterred from their most iniquitous and murderous purpose, by the sacred festival which they were celebrating,) were averse to the bodies continuing on the crosses during the next day; as this was both the first sabbath after the passover, and the second day of unleavened bread, from which the seven weeks till the pentecost were reckoned; and also the day for presenting the first-fruits of a sheaf of corn: and so it was a day of peculiar solemnity, which the people were preparing to observe with great exactness. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 13—18. Matt. 27:62—66. Luke 6:1.) They therefore besought Pilate to give orders that their legs might be broken, in order that they might be removed. This was sometimes done, from a sort of compassion, to hasten the death of those who lingered very long in their sufferings; but surely a speedier method of terminating their torture might have been devised! The soldiers, however, broke the legs of the two malefactors, who were still living: and thus they were instrumental to the fulfilment of our Lord's promise to the penitent thief, that he should "that day be with him in paradise." (Note, Luke 23:39—43.) But finding Jesus evidently dead, they broke not his legs: yet one of them, in a contemptuous and inhuman manner, thrust his spear into his side, from whence flowed a stream of blood and water, evidently distinguishable from each other. Probably, the pericardium was pierced; but, however the circumstance may be accounted for, it is allowed to have been a decisive evidence of his being actually dead: and thus the soldier's conduct was overruled, to take away all pretences to the contrary, by which his enemies might otherwise have attempted to invalidate the reality of his resurrection. (Mark 15:44.)—The evangelist himself was an eyewitness of this transaction, and he recorded it from his own knowledge as indisputable truth; that all who read his testimony may believe in the crucified Redeemer. For these circumstances were accomplishments of ancient types and prophecies concerning the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Ex. 12:46. Ps. 34:19,20. Zech. 12:9—14, v. 10.)—It can scarcely be doubted, that the only wise God had some special design, in commanding that no bone of the paschal lamb should be broken, though all must of course be dislocated. This had such a special reference to Christ, that St. John marks it as a matter of importance. Perhaps this may intimate, that as the natural body of Christ, after all his tortures, was so preserved by a special providence, that no bone was broken, but the whole was found entire at his resurrection; so the members of the mystical body of Christ, whatever sufferings and temptations they pass through, shall be preserved by divine grace from essential detriment; none shall be wanting, but all shall be forthcoming, complete and entire, at "the resurrection of the just." (Note, 6:36—40.)—It is evident likewise, that the apostle considered the blood and water as emblems of the distinct parts of salvation; namely, the pardon of our sins through the atoning blood of Christ, and the cleansing of our hearts by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which is conferred on us through the obedience unto death of our divine Saviour; and of which, indeed, the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's supper are signs, memorials, and pledges. V. 1—16. The conflict between convictions and corrupt

CHAPTER XX.

Mary Magdalene goes to the sepulchre, and, discovering that the stone was taken away, runs to tell Peter and John; who hasten thither, and find not the body, but only the grave-clothes in exact order, 1—10. Mary as she weeps sees two angels, and afterwards Jesus, who sends her to inform the apostles, 11—18. Jesus meets them, as assembled in the evening, and speaks peace to them, 19—23. Thomas, who was absent, remains resolutely incredulous, 24, 25. Jesus again meets the assembled disciples, and satisfies Thomas, who confesses him, as "his Lord, and his God," 26—29. "These things were written, that we might believe, and ... have life through his name," 30, 31.

THE [a]first day of the week [b]cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth [c]the stone taken away from the sepulchre.

2 Then she runneth, and cometh to Simon Peter, and [d]to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, [e]They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him.

3 Peter [f]therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre.

4 So they ran both together: and the other disciple did [g]outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre.

5 And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in.

6 Then [i]cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the [l]linen clothes lie;

7 And the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself.

8 Then went in also that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre, [k]and he saw, and believed.

9 For as yet [l]they knew not the Scripture, [m]that he must rise again from the dead.

10 Then the disciples [n]went away again unto their own home. [Practical Observations.] affections in unconverted men, is often strong: but where faith is wanting, the world will get the victory: and the dread of reproach or loss, or the hope of secular advantages, will induce them to venture the wrath of God, and all its tremendous consequences. (P. O. Matt. 27:19—25. Notes, Acts 24:24—27. 26:24—29.)—Every one is inexcusable, who commits known injustice, or deliberately acts contrary to his conscience, on whatever account: but the greater opportunities men possess of knowing the truth and will of God, the more aggravated will their guilt be found, in rebelling against the light. (Notes, Matt. 11:20—24. Luke 12:47,48.) Yet persons thus favourably distinguished, have often been most desperately engaged in opposing the power of godliness, and persecuting those whose doctrine and example tended to detect their hypocrisy and usurpations.—All those rulers of every description who have proudly sat in judgment on Christ and his servants, and condemned them, will soon stand before his tribunal; where they will "know the power of his wrath," and be constrained to confess with terror and anguish, that "Truly this was the Son of God." (Note, Rev. 1:7. 6:15—17.)

V. 17—30. We cannot wholly pass over this narrative of our Redeemer's crucifixion, without again reflecting, for a moment, on the complicated cruelties and indignities to which he was exposed, and not for any fault of his own, nay directly contrary to his deservings. But he was wounded and scourged, that we might be healed; he was arrayed with scorn in the purple robe, that he might procure for us sinners, "the robe of righteousness and salvation;" he was crowned with thorns, that we might be "crowned with honour and immortality;" he stood speechless, that we might have an all-prevailing plea; he endured torture, that we might have "a strong consolation;" he thirsted, that we might drink of the waters of life; he bore the wrath of the Father, that we might enjoy his favour; he "was numbered with transgressors," that we might be made "equal to angels;" he died, that we might live for ever!—Let us then often retire to survey this scene, and to admire his immeasurable love; that we may learn to mourn for sin, and hate it, and rejoice in our obligations to the Redeemer; and that we may be "constrained by love to live no longer to ourselves, but to him who died for us and rose again." (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)—As we ought to hear with thankful exultation, that the ransom and righteousness of our souls were perfected when Jesus said, "It is finished;" so we should be excited to redouble our diligence, that the work of sanctifying grace may be powerfully carried on towards perfection in our hearts. For we should look to him as our King, as well as our High-Priest.—In every way, it has been decidedly written, and the writing shall never be reversed, "that Jesus of Nazareth is the King" of the church and of the world; and all, who profess his religion, and "will not have him to reign over them," will be deemed guilty of "crucifying their King," with indignity and contempt.—We may be encouraged, by our Lord's attention to his deeply afflicted mother, when he hung upon the cross, to hope for his condescending pity in all our sorrows and distresses, now that he is exalted to the throne; but we may also learn, that the surest interest in his love will not secure our exemption from the sharpest temporal sufferings. His example likewise teaches all men to honour their parents, in every circumstance of life and death; to provide for their wants; and to promote their comfort, by every means in their power: and we ought also to show our love to Jesus, by behaving with courteous respect, affection, and liberal kindness, to the poorest and meanest of those whom he loves, and who love him. We ought indeed to act towards them as though they were our most honoured and endeared relatives; and we heard Jesus say to us, from his cross, and from his throne of glory, concerning this and the other poor and afflicted believer, "Behold my mother," "my brother," "my sister;" and, "Whatsoever ye do unto the least of these, ... ye do it unto me." (P. O. Matt. 12:38—50. 25:31—40. Mark 3:20—35.)

V. 31—42. The tender mercies of the wicked, and especially of persecutors, are cruel: but the preparation of hypocrites for religious ordinances, by the commission of the most horrible crimes, is the most detestable of abominations. Yet believers, if called to witness such scenes, should peculiarly observe how God overrules every thing to fulfil his own word. Thus, comparing the sacred oracles with the events which occur in the church and in the world, our faith will be increased even by the most discouraging transactions. May we then continually look to him, whom by our sins we also have, ignorantly and heedlessly, nay sometimes against convictions and mercies, pierced; and who shed from his wounded side both water and blood, that we "might be washed, and sanctified, and justified, in his name, and by the Spirit of our God." (Note, 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) Thus our hearts will be habitually affected with penitent sorrow and humiliation for sin, believing hope, and lively gratitude: and prepared for every service to which we are called. In this way, feeble, unestablished, and timorous believers will grow in grace, in knowledge, in stability, and boldness; and so be prepared to avow their relation to Jesus, in the time of extreme danger and difficulty: though they perhaps have formerly hesitated to confess him before men, when it might have been done with comparative safety.

NOTES.—CHAP. XX. V. 1—10. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Matt. 28:1—8. Mark 16:1—8. Luke 24:1—12.) Mary Magdalene seems to have arrived at the sepulchre before any of the other women, "when it was yet dark;" (1) and, finding the stone removed, she hastened back to inform Peter and John, that some persons had "taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre;" and, as she and her friends knew not "where they had laid him," they were deprived of the opportunity of showing their respect and affection, by embalming his body. It is very improbable that she should speak thus, if she had seen an angel informing her that Jesus was risen; (Matt. 28:5,6.) and therefore she doubtless was at the sepulchre apart from the other women.—Peter and John, however, hearing her report, set out together to the sepulchre, running as speedily as they could, in the eagerness of their minds, on this interesting, and to them perplexing occasion; but the latter, probably being the younger man, arrived there first, and, looking in, he saw the linen clothes lie, yet entered not in, perhaps being afraid. Soon after, Peter came up, and, according to the promptitude of his disposition, he entered into the sepulchre without hesitation; and found the grave-clothes laid in such regular order, as evinced that neither friends nor foes had taken away the body in a hasty manner, as fearing interruption or detection. Doubtless this, and several other things connected with our Lord's resurrection, were performed by the ministration of angels. (Matt. 4:11.) Upon this John also entered in; and, from what he saw, he was inwardly convinced that Jesus was risen; though neither he nor Peter had understood from the Scripture, or from the words of Christ, that the Messiah would rise again from the dead. (Marg. Ref. c—m. Notes, Mark 9:30—32. Luke 9:45. 24:25—31,44—49.) The apostles, however, having made their observations, returned to their company, to wait the event of these extraordinary occurrences; John, convinced that his beloved Lord was indeed risen, and Peter full of astonishment and uncertainty.

V. 11—18. Mary Magdalene, who had followed the apos-weeping: and, as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre, 12 And [q]seeth two angels [r]in white, sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain.

13 And they say unto her, [s]Woman, [t]why weepest thou? She saith unto them, [u]Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.

14 And when she had thus said, she turned herself back, [v]and saw Jesus standing, [w]and knew not that it was Jesus.

15 Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? [x]whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, [y]if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.

16 Jesus saith unto her, [z]Mary. [a]She turned herself, and saith unto him, [b]Rabboni; which is to say, Master.

17 Jesus saith unto her, [c]Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father: but go to [d]my brethren, and say unto them, [e]I ascend unto my Father, and [f]your Father; and to my God, and [g]your God.

18 Mary Magdalene [h]came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

19 ¶ Then [i]the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, [k]when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, [l]came Jesus, and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, [m]Peace be unto you.

20 And when he had so said, [n]he showed unto them his hands and his side. [o]Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord.

21 Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: [p]as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.

22 And when he had said this, [q]he breathed on them, and saith unto them, [r]Receive ye the Holy Ghost:

23 Whose [s]soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained. [Practical Observations.]

tles, oppressed with the most inconsolable sorrow, at length looked into the sepulchre, and there saw to angels, probably in the form of young men, clothed in white, and they immediately accosted her, inquiring the cause of her excessive sorrow. Yet she seems not to have greatly attended to them, perhaps in her confusion supposing them to have been disciples who had come to view the sepulchre: and therefore she answered them nearly in the words which she had used to the apostles. (2)—But, as she turned from them, Jesus himself was pleased to appear to her: yet, through excessive weeping, and not at all expecting to see him, she did not know him. And, supposing that it was the person employed by Joseph to take care of the garden, it occurred to her that perhaps he had removed the body to some other place; and therefore she, in very respectful terms, desired, that if he had, he would inform her, and she would take it away, and be at the expense and trouble of the funeral. (Marg. Ref. p—y.)—It is observable, that, though speaking to a supposed stranger, she did not mention the name of Jesus; but merely said "him," as if every body must of course know whom she meant!—Jesus then called to her by name; and his voice and address made him known to her. Turning herself therefore with joy and amazement, she called him "Rabboni," which seems to signify "Teacher," with particular respect and application: but when she was about to spend time in further expressing her affection, (Note, Matt. 28:9,10.) or perhaps to satisfy herself that it was not merely an apparition, Jesus prevented her, by saying, "Touch me not, &c." Thus he intimated that she would have other opportunities of expressing her joyful and affectionate regards: for, though he had repeatedly told his disciples, that he was about to go to his Father; yet he was not yet ascended, or about to ascend immediately, but should continue with them a short time on earth, for their satisfaction and comfort. (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, 6:60—65, v. 62. 14:2,3. 16:7—11,25—30.) In the mean while she ought, without delay, to carry the joyful news of his resurrection to the disconsolate disciples, whom he acknowledged as his "brethren," notwithstanding they had so lately forsaken him: and she was directed further to inform them that he was risen, in order "to ascend to his Father and their Father, and to his God and their God:" for as he, the eternal Son of God, had become their Brother by assuming human nature; so, through the work which he had now finished, they were become the children of God by regeneration and adoption; and his God and Father, as Man and Mediator, was become their God and Father also. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Note, Heb. 2:10—15.)—Mary, as instructed, went immediately to inform the apostles: yet even her testimony did not fully satisfy them. (Notes, Mark 16:9—13.)—Having now considered separately the different accounts, given by the four evangelists, of our Lord's resurrection, which seem at first sight not easily reconcileable to each other; it may be proper to state very briefly, the most approved method of forming the whole into one consistent narration. (Note, Matt. 28:9,10.)—It is supposed, that several women agreed to meet at the sepulchre, in order to embalm the body of Jesus; and that Joanna and some others with her, having undertaken to prepare the spices, purposed being there about sunrising: (Luke 23:55,56. 24:1—10.) but Mary Magdalene, the other Mary, and Salome, came to view the sepulchre, as the day "began to dawn." (Matt. 28:1.) Mary Magdalene seems to have arrived some short time before her companions, (1) and observing that the stone had been removed, she left them to wait for Joanna and her company, and returned back to inform Peter and John. In the mean time the other Mary and Salome came to the sepulchre, and saw the angel, as recorded by Matthew and Mark. While these women returned to the city, Peter and John went to the sepulchre, passing them at some distance, or going another way; but the angel did not appear to them. After their return Mary Magdalene saw a vision of two angels, and then Jesus himself, as here related; (Mark 16:9—11.) and immediately after, Jesus appeared to the other women as they returned to the city. (Matt. 28:9,10.) In the mean while Joanna and her company arrived at the sepulchre, and, entering it, at first they saw nothing, and only observed that the body was not there: but while they were perplexed on that account, two angels appeared to them, and addressed them, as the one angel had done the other women. (Luke 24:1—10.) They therefore returned immediately to the city, and by some means found the apostles, before the other women arrived, and informed them of what they had seen; upon which Peter went a second time to the sepulchre, but saw no angels, only the linen clothes lying. (Luke 24:12.) About this time the two disciples set off for Emmaus, having only heard the report of these women, and neither that of Mary Magdalene, nor yet that of the other Mary and Salome. (Luke 24:22—24,33,34.) These at length arrived, and informed the apostles that they had seen Jesus himself, and that two of them had been permitted to touch him; and some time after, on the same day, he appeared to Peter also. There are other ways of reconciling the apparent differences between the evangelists; but this seems to answer every purpose, as will readily appear to the attentive reader. V. 19—23. On the evening of the day on which our Lord arose, the apostles and other disciples met together, in some room which they had procured; probably, in order to join in prayer and supplication: though it seems, that they were sitting at meat, when Jesus came among them. (Notes, Mark 16:14—16. Luke 24:36—43.)—The evangelist especially notes, that this was "the first day of the week:" and this day is afterwards frequently mentioned by the sacred writers; for it was evidently set apart as the Christian sabbath, in commemoration of Christ's resurrection. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Acts 20:7—12. Rev. 1:9—11.)—The disciples had shut the doors, for fear of the Jews; as perhaps they were apprehensive lest they should be prosecuted by a false and absurd accusation, of stealing the body from the sepulchre. But, when they seem to have had no expectations of the kind, Jesus himself came and stood in the midst of them, having miraculously, but silently, opened the doors of the room, and entered by them.—"Though it be an ancient opinion, that Christ made his body penetrate through the doors; yet it is both groundless and absurd, and contrary to the very design of Christ in coming to them. It is groundless; for why might not he, by his power, secretly open the doors, his disciples not perceiving it; as the angel opened the prison doors and 24 ¶ But [t]Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, [u]was not with them when Jesus came.

25 The other disciples therefore said unto him, [v]We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, [w]Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.
26 ¶ And after [x]eight days, again his disciples were within, [a]and Thomas with them. Then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, [b]Peace be unto you.

27 Then saith he to Thomas, [c]Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: [d]and be not faithless, but believing.
28 And Thomas answered and said unto him, [e]My Lord and my God.
29 Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: [f]blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.
30 And [g]many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book:

gates to let out Peter? (Acts 12:10.) It is absurd: for since Christ rose in that natural body, which was crucified and laid in the grave; philosophy informs us, that such a body could not penetrate through another more solid body.... And... this fancy destroys not only the end of Christ's coming among them, but of all that he had said and done to convince them it was the same body that was crucified, in which he appeared to them.... It being as certain, that flesh and bones cannot penetrate through a door, as that "a spirit hath not flesh and bones."' Whitby.—Before his crucifixion, our Lord had promised the disciples, "his peace:" (Note, 14:27,28.) and he now authoritatively pronounced and conferred it upon them, as well as assured them that he was entirely reconciled to them after their late misconduct. To convince them also of the reality of his resurrection, he showed them his wounded hands and side; which satisfied their doubts, and filled them with gladness. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) And, having repeated to them the assurance of his peace, he also renewed and confirmed to them their apostolic commission, sending them forth to declare his truth to the world, and to be his ambassadors and vicegerents, or representatives, even "as the Father had sent him." (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, 17:17—19. 21:15—17.) And, as an earnest of the approaching descent of the Spirit upon them, as well as to show that that blessing would be communicated from his fulness, and according to his sovereign pleasure, "he breathed upon them, and said unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, Gen. 2:7.) Thus he showed them, that their spiritual life, and all their ability for their work, as well as their miraculous powers, were derived from him, and absolutely depended on him. After this he authorized them to declare the only method in which sin would be forgiven, and the character and experience of those who actually were pardoned, or the contrary. So that, to the end of time, the rules and evidences of absolution or condemnation, which they laid down, and which are contained in their writings, infallibly hold good; and all decisions concerning the state of any man, or body of men, in respect of acceptance with God, whether by preaching absolution, or excommunication, or in any other way, are valid and ratified in heaven, provided they accord with the doctrine and rules of the apostles; but not otherwise. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Matt. 16:19. 18:18. 1 John 1:5—7.)—Receive ye the Holy Ghost. (22) It does not appear, that the apostles, on any occasion, used these words. Peter and John prayed for the disciples in Samaria, that "they might receive the Holy Ghost."..."Then laid they their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost." (Acts 8:15,17.) The language of authority, used by our Lord on this single occasion, seems exclusively appropriate to the great Head of the church, and marks the immense disparity between him and his most eminent servants.—How far the words, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost' in some of the forms of our church, is scriptural or warrantable, may be worthy the consideration of all persons more immediately concerned in the important transactions referred to. (See Ordination office of priests, and office for consecrating bishops.)

V. 24—29. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 11:11—16. Matt. 10:1—4.) It is not known on what account Thomas was absent at this critical time; perhaps he was even tempted to renounce his hope in Jesus, and to leave the company of the apostles. He, however, positively refused to credit those who had been satisfied, by the testimony of their senses, that Jesus was risen. With peculiar emphasis, in language which seems to intimate that he had witnessed, and been deeply affected by, all the circumstances of our Lord's crucifixion, yet with determined incredulity, he declared he would not believe, without the combined testimony of his eyes and hands, in different ways: a demonstration, which few of the human race could possibly receive. He might, therefore, most justly have been left in his unbelief, after the rejection of such abundant proof as had already been vouchsafed him. But his gracious Lord was pleased to "deal with him according to the multitude of his mercies." For, eight days after, or on the eighth day, (that is, "on the first day of the week," Note, 19—23.) the disciples were again assembled, perhaps by some intimation from Christ, Thomas being with them; and Jesus again appeared among them, in the same manner, and with the same condescending and affectionate salutation as before. He then made Thomas sensible that he knew, without information, all his unbelieving objections and demands, and at the same time offered him the fullest satisfaction which he could desire. It does not appear whether Thomas actually examined our Lord's hands and side, or not: but his knowledge of his person, the proof of his resurrection, the concurring evidence of Jesus knowing the state of his mind, as well as his tender compassion for him; joined to a recollection, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, of what Christ had said of his being "One with the Father;" had such an immediate effect upon him, that he at once not only confessed him as risen from the dead, but addressed, nay, in fact, adored him, as "his Lord and his God;" "Emmanuel," God in human nature, "God manifest in the flesh;" and as such entitled to all confidence, love, obedience, and worship. (Notes, 1:1—3. 5:20—23. 10:26—31, v. 30. Matt. 1:20,21. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Nothing can more fully prove that this was the meaning of Thomas, than the frivolous evasion to which the Socinians are here driven, as their only refuge from conviction: they pretend that the apostle did not mean to call Jesus his Lord and his God; but that he exclaimed, "My Lord and my God!" as people sometimes do when greatly astonished. (Note, Ex. 20:7.) Such exclamations are doubtless a violation of the third commandment; yet this supposes that the apostles were guilty of it in the presence of Christ, and that he approved of it! Surely such a solution is the most improbable which can be imagined! But Thomas evidently addressed these words to Christ, which is decisive against that opinion. "He answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God:" I acknowledge thee to be my Lord and my God.—Our Lord approved of his present faith and adoration, as justly due to him; and only with gentleness reproved his former unbelief. He had indeed been convinced by the testimony of his senses, but there had been and were many, and there would be immense multitudes in future ages, who could not have such overbearing evidence; yet would they be peculiarly blessed in believing in him. It was not said, that they would be more blessed than Thomas: but it intimated, that if others should prove as incredulous as he had been, very few indeed could inherit the blessing; and it implied, that those who never saw Jesus, and yet believed in him, would be no losers by that apparent disadvantage; yea, that believing on competent evidence, without requiring such absolute demonstration, would denote a more teachable frame of mind, and be more honourable to God. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:8,9.)

The indefinite tenses are used, and all, in every age, who have believed, do believe, or shall believe, in an unseen Saviour, are blessed. Our version seems to limit it to the past; "have believed."

It may here be proper to add a compendious view of the evidence, which we, after so many ages, possess of our Lord's resurrection: for this is the grand external demonstration of the truth of Christianity.—It must be premised, that almost all human affairs are conducted on man's testimony: even in the great concerns of life and death, the concurring evidence of two or three persons of good character, sober sense, and competent information, is deemed abundantly sufficient proof of any fact, which is in its own nature credible; especially if it be clear, that they derive no worldly advantage from the testimony which they give. The resurrection of Christ, as connected with the divine authority of Revelation, and the glory of God in the salvation of innumerable multitudes of immortal souls, was an event in itself perfectly credible; as sufficient reasons may be assigned, for the interposition of almighty power to effect it. (Note, Acts 26:4—8.) To prepare the way for the testimony to be given of this event, it was
